cranberry-tree (kran'ber-i-tre), n. The high or bush cranberry, Viburnum Opulus, a shrub of North America and Europe, bearing soft, red, globose, acid drupes or berries. The cultivated form with sterile flowers having enlarged corollas, is known as the ornamental or quadrifid tree.

crance (krams), n. Naut., an old name for any boom-iron, but particularly for an iron cap attached to the outer end of the bowsprit, through which the jib-boom passes.

cranch (kranch), v. t. Same as cranch.

Cranchia (kranch'i-a), n. [NL. (Leach), < Cranch, an E. proper name.] The typical genus of the family Cranchiidae.

cranchiid (kranch'i-id), n. A cephalopod of the family Cranchiidae.

Cranchiidae (kranch'i-i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Cranchia + -idae.] A family of acetsbuliferous staves of a cask or barrel in which the edge of the head is inserted.—2. A cooper's tool for cutting a cross-groove in staves for the head of a cask. It resembles a circular plane.

Cooper's Cross.

croze (kröz), v. t.; pret. and pp. crozed, pp. crozing. [croze, n.] 1. To make a croze or groove in, as a barrel.—2. In hat-making, to re-fold (a hat-body) so that different surfaces may in turn be presented to the action of the felting-machine.

crozier, crozier (kröz'hér), n. [ME. crozier, crocor, croyeur, croyeer, a bishop's pastoral staff, a crozier, lengthened (with -er) from croz, crozme, croce, a bishop's pastoral staff, a crozier: see cross.] Often referred, erroneously, to crucifix, which is only remotely connected.] 1. A staff about 5 feet long, ending in a hook or curve, or, in the case of an archbishop's crozier, surmounted by an ornamented cross or crucifix, borne by or before a bishop or archbishop on solemn occasions. The staff is hollow, commonly gilt, and highly ornamented. Early croziers were exceedingly simple. The patriarch's staff bears a cross with two transverse bars, that of the pope one with three. See patriarchal cross, processional cross, papal cross, under cross. Also called cross-staff.

Crozier.

2. From tomb of Archbishop Warham, Canterbury, England, a. from drawing in British Museum.

His (the Bishop's) Episcopal staff in his hand, bending round at the top, called by us English men a Crozier.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 37. But instead of a parliament, the Lord Deputy summoned an ecclesiastical assembly, in which the rival croziers of Armagh and Dublin, of the Primate of all Ireland and the Primate of Ireland, encountered one another in his presence.

H. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xix.

24. One who bears the crozier or the cross; a cross-bearer.

crozzle (kröz'l), n. [E. dial. also crozill; cf. prozzle, v.] A half-burnt coal.

The spear-head bears marks of having been subjected to a hot fire, the point especially having been burnt to a crozzle. N. and Q., 7th ser., III. 422.

crozzle (kröz'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. crozzled, pp. crozzling. [cf. crozzle, n.] To burn to a coal; char; coke.

Some of the coal is of a crozzling or coking nature. Ure, Dict., I. 523.

crucis, n. Latin plural of crux.

crucial (kröz'shi-ál), a. [*F. crucial, < L. as if *crucialis, < crux (crucio), a cross: see crux*.] 1. Having the form of a cross; transverse; intersecting; decessating: as, a crucial incision.—2. In anat., specifically applied to two stout decessating ligaments in the interior of the knee-joint, connecting the spine of the tibia with the intercondyloid fossa of the femur.—3. Decisive, as between two hypotheses; finally disproving one of two alternative suppositions.

This meaning of the word is derived from Bacon's phrase instantia crucis, which he explains as a metaphor from a finger-post (crux). The supposed reference to a judicial "test of the cross," as well as that to the testing of metals in a crucible, which different writers have thought they found in the expression, are unknown to as learned a lawyer and a chemist as Bacon and Boyle. These supposed derivations have, however, influenced some writers in their use of the word.

It is true that we cannot find an actually crucial instance of a pure morality taught as an infallible revelation, and so in time ceasing to be morality for that reason alone. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 227.

It is these thousand millions that will put to a crucial test the absorbing and assimilating powers of Christianity. Quarterly Rev., CLXIII. 143.

4. Of or pertaining to a crucible; like a heated crucible as a utensil of chemical analysis.

And from the imagination's crucial heat Catch up their men and women all a flame For action. Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, v.

5. Pertaining to or like a cross as an instrument of torture for eliciting the truth; excessively strict and severe: said of a proceeding of inquiry. [Rare.]—Crucial ligaments. See def. 2.

crucian, crucian (kröz'shi-an), n. [An accom. form, with suffix -ian, = D. karus (Kilian) = Sw. karussa, Dan. karusse = G. karussche, formerly karüsch, also karas; appar. < F. carassin (> also the NL. specific name carassius), a crucian, = It. carassio, a crucian, < L. caracinus, < Gr. καραίνω, a fish like a perch (so called from its black color), lit. a young raven, dim. of κάρα, a raven: see caracine, Caraz.] A short, thick, broad fish, of a deep-yellow color, the Carassius carassius, or German carp, of the family Cyprinidae. It differs from the common carp in having no barbels at its mouth. It inhabits lakes, ponds, and sluggish rivers in the north of Europe and Asia, and has been found in the Thames in England. It is an excellent food-fish. Also called Prussian carp. A variety is known as C. gibelio, a name, however, also applied to the true crucian. See carp.

Crucian-carp (Carassius carassius).

crucian-carp (kröz'shi-an-kärp), n. A book-name of the fish (carassius carassius or vulgaris, the crucian).

Immediately I was so cruciate, that I desired . . . death to take me. Sir T. Eliot, The Governour, II. 12.

2. In bot., having the form of a cross with equal arms, as the flowers of mustard, etc.; cruciform: applied also to tetraspores of red marine algae. See tetraspore.—3. In zool., crucial or cruciform; crossed or cross-shaped; specifically, in entom., crossing each other diagonally in repose, as the wings of many hymenopterous insects and the hemelytra of the Heteroptera.—Cruciate anther, an anther attached to the filament at the middle, and with the free extremities sagittate.—Cruciate prothorax or pronotum, in entom., a prothorax or pronotum having two strongly elevated lines or crests which approach each other angularly in the middle, forming a figure something like a St. Andrew's cross, as in certain Orthoptera.

cruciate-complicate (kröz'shi-ät-kom'pli-kät), a. In entom., folded at the ends and crossed one over the other on the abdomen, as the wings in many Coleoptera.

cruciate-incumbent (kröz'shi-ät-in-kum'bent), a. In entom., laid flat on the back, one over the other, but not folded, as the wings in most heteropterous Hemiptera.

crucially (kröz'shi-ät-li), adv. In a cruciate manner; so as to resemble a cross: as, "crucially parted," Farlow, Marine Algae, p. 151.

cruciation (kröz'shi-ä-shun), n. [< LL. cruciatio(-n), < L. cruciare, pp. cruciatus, torment: see cruciate<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. The act of torturing; torment; excruciation.

We have to do with a God that delights more in the prosperity of his saints than in the cruciation and howling of his enemies. By. Hall, Soul's Farewell to Earth, § 7.

2. The state of being cruciate or cruciform; decessation.

cruciatory (kröz'shi-ä-tö-ri), a. [< LL. cruciatorius, < cruciator, a tormentor, < L. cruciare, pp. cruciatus, torment: see cruciate<sup>1</sup>, v.] Torturing.

These cruciatory passions do operate sometimes with such a violence that they drive him to despair.

crucible (kröz'si-bl), n. [Formerly also spelled crucible; < ML. crucibulum, crucibulum, crucibulus, crucibolus, crucibulum, crucibulum, crucibulus, a melting-pot, also a hanging lamp; an accom. form (as if dim. of L. crux (crucio), a cross; hence often associated with crucial, with ref. to a crucial test), < OF. cruche, an earthen pot, a crock: see crock<sup>1</sup>, and of crucet, cruce, and crucio.] 1. A vessel or melting-pot for chemical purposes, made of pure clay or other material, as black-lead, porcelain, platinum, silver, or iron, and so baked or tempered as to endure extreme heat without fusing. It is used for melting ores, metals, etc. Earthen crucibles are shaped upon a potter's wheel with the aid of a templet or molding-blade, or under pressure in a molding-press. Metallic crucibles, especially those of platinum, are chiefly used in chemical analyses and assays.

Crucibles.

Some that deal much in the fusion of metals inform me that the melting of a great part of a crucible into glass is no great wonder in their furnaces. Boyle, Works, I. 490.

2. A hollow place at the bottom of a chemical furnace, for collecting the molten metal.—3. Figuratively, a severe or searching test: as, his probity was tried in the crucible of temptation.

Or'er the crucible of pain Watches the tender eye of Love. Whittier, The Shadow and the Light.

Historians tried to place all the mythologies in a crucible of criticism, and hoped to extract from them some golden grains of actual fact. Keary, Prim. Belief, p. 2.

Crucible steel. Name as cast-steel.—Hessian crucible, a crucible made of the best fire-clay and coarse sand. It is used in the United States in all experiments where fluxes are needed. E. H. Knight.

crucifer (kröz'si-fér), n. [< LL. crucifer, n.: see cruciferous.] 1. A cross-bearer; specifically, one who carries a large cross in ecclesiastical processions.

At half-past ten the choir entered, preceded by the crucifer and followed by the . . . rector. The Churchman, LIV. 513.

2. In bot., a plant of the order Crucifera.

Crucifera (kröz'si-fér-ä), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (sc. L. plantar, plants) of crucifer: see cruciferous.] A very extensive natural order of dicotyledonous plants, of about 175 genera and 1,500 species, found in all countries, but least abundant in the tropics. They are annual or perennial herbs, with arid or pungent juice, cruciform flowers, six stamens, of which two are shorter than the others, and mostly two-celled pods, either opening by two valves (rare-

Sp. crucifijo* = Sp. crucifijo = It. crucifisso, crucifisso = D. kruis, krucifis = G. kruis = Dan. Sw. kruis, < ML. crucifixum, a crucifix, prop. neut. of LL. crucifigere, pp. of crucifigere, crucify: see crucify, v.] 1. A cross, or representation of a cross, with the crucified figure of Christ upon it. Crosses with a representation of the crucified Christ seem not to have been made previous to the ninth century; upon those made for similar purposes before this date is painted or carved at the intersection of the arms of the cross the Lamb with or without the crossed flag, the sacred monogram, or some other emblem. Byzantine crucifixes of bronze exist of as early date as the tenth century, in which the flat surface of the cross is decorated with enamel, having the sun and moon as emblematic of creation witnessing the crucifixion; in these the body of Christ is generally partly clothed with a garment indicated in colored enamel. Crucifixes are used in many ways in the devotions and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church, being conspicuously displayed in religious houses and other situations, and worn upon the person by ecclesiastics and others.

Bronze Crucifix.—Romanesque style, decorated with enamel.

The Crucifix, before which the barbarian bowed, was the emblem and witness of all-sufficing love.
Channing, Perfect Life, p. 230.

No crucifix has been found in the catacombs; no certain allusion to a crucifix is made by any Christian writer of the first four centuries.
Cath. Diet.

2. The cross of Christ; hence, the religion of Christ. Jor. Taylor. [Rare.]—Jansenist crucifix, a crucifix in which the arms of the Saviour hang down from the shoulders, instead of being outstretched. Lee.

The act of fixing to a cross, or the state of being stretched on a cross: an ancient Oriental mode of inflicting the death-penalty, applied in rare instances by the Greeks and more commonly by the Romans, by both Greeks and Romans considered an infamous form of death, and reserved in general for slaves and highway robbers. Among the Romans, the instrument of death was properly either a cross in the form now familiar, or the cross known as St. Andrew's; sometimes a standing tree was made to serve the purpose. The person executed was attached to the cross either by nails driven through the hands and feet or by cords, and was left to die of exhaustion or received the mercy of a quicker death, according to circumstances.

Specifically—2. The putting to death of Christ upon the cross on the hill of Calvary.

This earthquake, according to the opinion of many learned men, happened at our Saviour's crucifixion.
Addison, Travels in Italy.

crusade (krŭ-sād'), n. [Early mod. E. also crusado, croisade, croisado, croisat, earlier crusade, late ME. crusade, croisat (being variously accented to the ML., Sp., or F.); = F. croisade (after Pr.), OF. croisade (also in another form croisere) = Fr. croisade, croisada = Sp. Pg. crusada = It. crociata, < ML. crociata, a crusade, lit. (sc. expeditio (n.)) an expedition of persons marked with or bearing the sign of the cross, prop. fem. pp. of cruciare, mark with the cross, < L. crus (crus-), cross: see cross, n. and v., and cruciate. The earlier ME. word for 'crusade' was crusery: see crusery.] 1. A military expedition under the banner of the cross; specifically, one of the medieval expeditions undertaken by the Christians of Europe for the recovery of the Holy Land from the Mohammedans. The crusading spirit was aroused throughout Europe in 1095 by the preaching of the monk Peter the Hermit, who with Walter the Penniless set out in 1096 with an immense rabble, who were nearly all destroyed on the way. The first real crusade, under Godfrey of Bouillon, 1099-9, resulted in the capture of Jerusalem and the establishment of a Christian kingdom in the Holy Land; the second, 1147, preached by St. Bernard, was unsuccessful; the third, 1189-92, led by the prince Frederick Barbarossa of Germany, Richard the Lion-hearted of England, and Philip Augustus of France, failed to recover Jerusalem, which the Mussulmans had taken in 1187; the fourth, 1202-4, ended in the establishment of a Latin empire in Constantinople, under Count Baldwin of Flanders, one of its leaders, the fifth, 1228-9, under the emperor Frederick II, the sixth, 1244-50, under St. Louis (Louis IX. of France), and the seventh and last, 1270-71, also under St. Louis, were all unsuccessful. There were other expeditions called crusades, including one of boys, 1212, 'the children's crusade,' in which many thousands perished by shipwreck or were enslaved. The cost of the crusades and the loss of life in them were enormous, but they stimulated commerce and the interchange of ideas between the West and the East. The expeditions against the Albigenses under papal auspices, 1207-29, were also called crusades.

For the crusade preached through western Christendom, A. D. 1188, it was ordained that the English should wear a white cross; the French a red; the Flemish a green one. Quoted in Root's Church of our Fathers, III. 1. 446, note. The Crusades, with all their drawbacks, were the trial test of a new world, a reconstituted Christendom, striving after a better ideal than that of piracy and fraternal bloodshed. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 322. 2. Any vigorous concerted action for the defense or advancement of an idea or a cause, or in opposition to a public evil: as, a temperance crusade; the crusade against slavery.

The unwearied, unostentatious, and inglorious crusade of England against slavery may probably be regarded as among the three or four perfectly virtuous acts recorded in the history of nations. Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 161.

crusader (krŭ-sā-dēr), n. [CL. equiv. crusator.] A person engaged in a crusade. The crusaders of the middle ages bore as a badge on the breast or the shoulder a representation of the cross, the assumption of which, called 'taking the cross,' constituted a binding engagement and released them from all other obligations.

If other pilgrims had their peculiar marks, so too had the crusader. For a token of that vow which he had plighted, he always wore a cross sewed to his dress, under he went to, and all the while he stayed in, the Holy Land. Root, Church of our Fathers, III. 1. 448.

With all their faults these nobles (of Cyprus) were bona fide Crusaders: men who, like the first champions, were ready to cast in their lot in a Promised Land, and not, like the later adventurers, anxious merely to get all they could out of it, to make their fortunes. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 300.

crusading (krŭ-sā-ding), p. a. [Ppr. of *crusade*¹, v.] Of or pertaining to the crusades; engaged in or favoring a crusade or crusades.

CRUX (kruks), n.; pl. cruxes, crucos (kruk'ses, krö'ses). [L., a cross: see cross<sup>1</sup>, n.] 1. A cross. See phrases below. Specifically—2. [cap.] The Southern Cross, the most celebrated constellation of the southern heavens. It was erected into a constellation by Bayer in 1679, but was often spoken of as a cross before; there even seems to be an obscure allusion to it in Dante. It is situated south of the western part of Centaurus, east of the keel of Argus. It is a small constellation of four chief stars, arranged in the form of a cross. Its brightest star, the southernmost, is of about the first magnitude; the eastern, half a magnitude fainter; the northern, of about the second magnitude; and the western, of the third magnitude and faint. The constellation owes its striking effect to its compression, for it subtends only about 6° from north to south and still less from east to west. It looks more like a kite than a cross. All four stars are white except the northernmost, which is of a clear orange-color. It contains a fifth star of the fourth magnitude, which is very red.

3. The cross as an instrument of torture; hence, anything that puzzles or vexes in a high degree; a conundrum.

Dear dean, since in cruxes and puns you and I deal,

This Ipswich fellow's insolence. Shak., Hen. VIII., i. 1.

To cry halves. See half, s.—To cry mew. See the extract.

With respect to criing mew, it appears to have been an old and approved method of expressing dislike at the first representation of a play. Decker has many allusions to the practice; and, what appears somewhat strange, in his Patronastix, charges Jonson with mewing at the fate of his own works. "When your plays are misliked at court you shall not cry mew, like a puss, and say you are glad you write out of the courtier's element." Gifford, Note to R. Jonson's Every Man out of his Humour, Ind.

To cry (one) mercy, to beg (one's) pardon.

Forth I counsaile alle Cristene to orie Crist meroy,
And Marie his moder to beo mene bi-trens. Piers Plowman (A), viii. 182.

I cry you mercy, madam; was it you?

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., i. 2.

Sir, this messenger makes so much haste that I cry you mercy for spending any time of this letter in other employment than thanking you for yours. Dante, Letters, xii.

To cry one's eyes out, to weep inordinately.—To cry up. (a) To praise; applaud; extol: as, to cry up a man's talents or patriotism, or a woman's beauty; to cry up the administration.

Laughing loud, and criing up your own wit, though perhaps borrowed. E. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, ii. 1.

Thus finally it appears that those purer Times were no such as they cry d up, and not to be followed without suspicion, doubt, and danger. Milton, Reformation in Eng., i.

(b) To raise the price of by proclamation: as, to cry up certain coins.

CRY (kri), n.; pl. ories (kris). [ME. cry, orie, orie, ori = MEG. krie, krie, < OF. ori, orida, orie, F. ori = Fr. orit, orida = Sp. Pg. grito, grita = It. grido, grida, a cry (ML. orida, clamor, proclamation); from the verb.] 1. Any loud or passionate utterance; clamor; outcry; a vehement expression of feeling or desire, articulate or inarticulate: as, a cry of joy, triumph, surprise, pain, supplication, etc.

And there shall be a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt. Ex. xi. 6.

He forgetteth not the cry of the humble. Ps. xl. 12.

One cry of grief and rage rose from the whole of Protestant Europe. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. A loud inarticulate sound uttered by man or beast, as in pain or anger, or to attract attention.

I could have kept a hawk, and well have hollow'd
To a deep cry of dogs. Pletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, ii. 4.

One deep cry
Of great wild beasts. Tompkins, Palace of Art.

3. Loud lamentation or weeping; hence, the act of weeping; a fit of weeping.

And then a-noon began so grette a noyse and sorrowful crye, that all the court was troubled. Martin (E. R. T. S.), i. 28.

Oh! would I were dead now,
Or up in my bed now,
To cover my head now,
And have a good cry!

Need, A Table of Needs.

4. Public notice or advertisement by edict, as when one gives of their wares; proclamation, as by a town clerk.

Also if they be any man that hangeth not out a lantern with a candle burning therein according to the Mayor's ords. Arnold's Chronicle, 1803 (ed. 1831, p. 64).

At midnight there was a cry made. Behold, the bright-green comet. Shak. Cor. III. 2.

5. Public or general accusation; evil report or fame.

Because the cry of [against] Sodom and Gomorrah is great, . . . I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it. Gen. xviii. 20, 21.

6. A pack of dogs.

You common cry of curs! Shak., Cor. III. 2.
A cry of hell-hounds never ceasing bark'd. Milton, P. L. II. 654.

Hence—7. In contempt, a pack or company of persons.

Would not this get me fellowship in a cry of players? Shak., Hamlet, III. 2.

8. A word or phrase used in battle, as a shout to encourage or rally soldiers; a battle-cry or war-cry.

Enter an English soldier, crying A Talbot! A Talbot! Sold. The cry of Talbot serves me for a sword. Shak., 1 Hen. VI. II. 1.

Ho! friends! and ye that follow, cry my cry! William Morris, Doom of King Acrisius.

9. A party catchword; an object for the attainment of which insistence and iteration are employed for partisan purposes; some topic, event, etc., which is used, or the importance of which is magnified, in a partisan manner.

"And to manage them [a constituency] you must have a good cry," said Taper. "All now depends upon a good cry." Dunbar, Congress, II. 3.

If the project fails in the present Reichstag, it would certainly be a bad cry for the government at the next elections. Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 290.

10. The peculiar crackling noise made by metallic tin when bent.—A far cry, a great distance, a long way.

It's a far cry to Lochawe. Proverb.

We must not be impatient, it is a far cry from the dwellers in caves to even such civilization as we have achieved. Lowell, Harvard Anniversary.

Great cry and little wool, much ado about nothing, a great show and pretense with little or no result.—Hue and cry. See hue.—In full cry, in full pursuit. Sold. of the dogs in a hunt when all are on the scent and are baying in chorus. often used figuratively.

The dunce hunt in full cry, till they have run down a reputation. Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xx.

crystal (kri'al), n. [Cf. W. ogyr, a heron, a screamer; oreydd, oreyr, a heron; orychydd, a heron, a ruffler.] The heron.

crystal, n. Same as oreydd, 3.

crystal, n. 1. Same as oreydd.—2. The female or young of the goshawk, Accipiter palmarum, called falcon-gentle.

crystal (kri'ing), p. a. [Pr. of ory, v. i., in def. 2.] 1. Demanding attention or remedy; notorious; unendurable.

Those other crying sins of ours . . . pull . . . plagues and miseries upon our heads. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 66.

2. Melancholy; lamenting.

Who shall now sing your crying elegies,
And strike a sad soul into senseless pictures?
Beau and Fl., Philaster, III. 2.

crying-bird (kri'ing-bird), n. The courlan or curan, Aramus pictus.

crying-out (kri'ing-out'), n. [See to cry out (o), under ory, v. i.] The confinement of a woman; labor.

Aunt Nell, who, by the way, was at the crying-out. Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, VI. 323.

cryodinia (kri-mō-din'i-tā), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυός, cold, a cold, a chill, + δύναμις, pain.] Chronic rheumatism. Dunham.

cryon, n. Same as crystal.

cryocrite (kri-ōk'ē-nit), n. [Cf. Gr. κρυός, cold, frost, + κρίτης, dust, + κρίτης.] The name given by Nordenfjöld to a gray powder noticed by him in various places in Greenland on the surface of the inland ice, at a great distance from earth or rock, and which he considered to be of cosmic (meteoric) origin. This view was based in part on the occurrence, in addition to magnetite, of fine particles of metallic iron in the powder. The theory of the cosmic origin of cryocrite does not appear as yet to have been generally admitted.

cryogen (kri'ō-jen), n. [Cf. Gr. κρυός, cold, frost, + γεννέω, producing; see gen.] That which produces cold; a freezing-mixture; an appliance or contrivance for reducing temperature below 0° C. F. G. G. G.

cryolite, kryolite (kri'ō-lit), n. [Cf. Gr. κρυός, cold, frost, + λίθος, stone.] A fluoride of sodium and aluminum found in Greenland, where it forms an extensive bed. It occurs in glasslike masses, also in distinct crystals, and has a glasslike vitreous luster, and a pale grayish-white, snow-white, or yellowish-brown color. It is important as a source of the metal aluminum, and is also used for making soda and some kinds of glass. Cryolite has also been discovered in Alaska in the Oral mountains, and in small quantities in Colorado.—Cryolite glass, or hot-melt porcelain, a semi-transparent or milky-white glass, made of silica and cryolite with oxide of zinc, melted together. Also called solignum and solignum porcelain.

cryophorus (kri-ōf'ō-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυός, cold, frost, + φόρος, bearing, < φέρω = to bear.] An instrument for showing the fall of temperature in water by evaporation. One form consists of two glass globes united by a tube. Water is poured into one globe and boiled to expel the air, and while boiling the apparatus is hermetically sealed. When cool, the pressure of the included vapor is reduced to that due to the temperature of the surrounding atmosphere. The empty globe is then surrounded by a freezing mixture, the vapor is condensed, and rapid evaporation takes place from the other globe, which is soon frozen by the lowering of its temperature.

cryophyllite (kri-ō-fil'it), n. [Cf. Gr. κρυός, cold, frost, + φύλλον, leaf, + λίθος.] A kind of mica occurring in the granite of Cape Ann, Massachusetts.

Cryptairhina (krip-si-rī'nā), n. [NL., orig. Cryptairhina (Vieillot, 1816), also, and more correctly, Cryptairhina (on another model, Cryptairhina), < Gr. κρυπτεω, hide (κρυψω, a hiding), + αίρη, bird, nose.] A genus of tree-crows, of the subfamily Callaeinae, having as its type C. varana, the terms or so-called variable crow of Java. The genus is extended by some authors to include the Callaeinae at large, or birds of the genera Tennurus, Dendroica, and Vagabunda.

crypta (krip'us), n. [Also crypta, < Gr. κρυπτεω, concealment, < κρυπτεω, conceal; see crypt.] Concealment. See extract.

The Tübingen divines advocated the crypta or concealment, that is, the secret use of all divine attributes. Schaf.

cryptorchid, cryptorchis (krip-ōr'kid, -kis), n. [Cf. Gr. κρυπτεω (future κρυψω), hide, + ὄρχις, testicle.] Same as cryptorchis.

crypt (kript), n. [= Dan. krypte = F. crypte = Fr. cropt (also crota) = Sp. cripta = Fg. cripta = It. cripta, < L. cripta, < Gr. κρυπτεω or κρυπτή, a vault, crypt, fem. of κρυπτός, hidden, secret, verbal adj. of κρυπτεω, hide, keep secret, akin to καλύπτω, cover, hide. See crode, crowd, and groat, groth, ult. doublets of crypt.] 1. A hidden or secret recess; a subterranean cell or cave, especially one constructed or used for the interment of bodies, as in the catacombs.

What had been a wondrous and intimate experience of the soul, a flash into the very crypt and basis of man's nature from the fire of trial, had become ritual and tradition. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 237.

2. A part of an ecclesiastical building, as a cathedral, church, etc., below the chief floor,

Crypt—Cathedral of Bourges, France commonly set apart for monumental purposes, and sometimes used as a chapel or a shrine.

My knees are bow'd in crypt and shrine. Shakespeare, Sir Galahad.

A crypt, as a portion of a church, had its origin in the subterranean chapels known as "confessiones," erected around the tomb of a martyr, or the place of his martyrdom. Encyc. Brit., VI. 667.

3. In anat., a follicle; a small simple tubular or sacular secretory pit; a small glandular cavity; as, a mucous crypt (a follicular secre-tory pit in mucous membrane). See follicle. Also crypt.—Crypts of Meibomian, the follicles of Meibomian in the eyelids.—Multilocular crypt, a mucous glandular follicle; a secretory pit with branches or diverticula.

crypta (krip'tā), n.; pl. crypta (-tā). [NL., use of L. crypta; see crypt.] In anat., same as crypt, 3.

Cryptacanthodes (krip'ta-kan-thō'dēs), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden (see crypt), + ἀκανθός, spine, + αἰώδης, form.] A genus of biennial fishes, typical of the family Cryptacanthodidae.

cryptacanthodid (krip-ta-kan-thō'did), n. A fish of the family Cryptacanthodidae.

Cryptacanthodidae (krip'ta-kan-thō'di-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Cryptacanthodes + -idae.] A family of fishes, typified by the genus Cryptacanthodes. They are biennial fishes with an eel-like aspect, a long dorsal fin sustained by stout spines only, no ventrals, and an oblong subcylindrical head. Two species inhabit the northwestern Atlantic, and have been called cryptacanthodes, and one inhabits the Alaskan seas. Also Cryptacanthodes.

crypta, n. Plural of crypta.
cryptal (krip'tal), a. [Crypt + -al.] In anat. and physiol., pertaining to or derived from a crypt. See crypt, 3.

The use of the cryptal or follicular secretion is to keep the parts on which it is poured supple and moist, and to preserve them from the action of irritating bodies with which they have to come in contact. Dunham.

crypted (krip'ted), a. [Crypt + -ed.] In arch., vaulted. [Rare.]

A crypted hall and stair lead to the chapter-house. A. J. C. How, Rome, III.

cryptic (krip'tik), a. and n. [L.L. crypticus, < Gr. κρυπτικός, hidden, < κρυπτός, hidden; see crypt.] 1. a. Hidden; secret; occult.

This cryptic and involved method of his providence have I ever admired. St. J. Brown, Railroad Medici, I. 17.

The subject is the receiver of Godhead, and as every comparison must feel his being enhanced by that cryptic might. Emerson, Experience.

Cryptic syllogism, a syllogism not in regular form, the premises being transposed, or one of them omitted, or both omitted, and only the middle term indicated. The following is an example of the last kind. "The existence of Jesus of Nazareth proves that true greatness is not confined to the male sex."

II. 1. The art of recording any discourse so that the meaning is concealed from ordinary readers.

There be also other diversities of Methods, vulgar and received, as that of Resolution or Analysis, of Constitution or Synthesis, of Concealment or Cryptic, etc., which I do allow well of. Bacon, Advancement of Learning (Original English ed.), Works, III. 407.

cryptical (krip'ti-kal), a. Same as cryptic.

cryptically (krip'ti-kal-i), adv. Secretly; in an occult manner.

We take the word acid in a familiar sense, without cryptically distinguishing it from those saps that are akin to it. Boyle.

Crypticus (krip'ti-kus), n. [NL., < L.L. crypticus, covered, concealed; see crypto.] In zool.: (a) A genus of arachnids, including the heteromorphous beetles, of the family Tenebrionidae. C. quisquilius, a European species, is an example. Latroille, 1817. (b) A genus of birds, of the family Momotidae, or sawbills. Swinson, 1837.

crypto- [L., etc., crypto-, < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret; see crypt.] An element in words of Greek origin, meaning 'hidden, concealed, not evident or obvious.' See calypso.

cryptobranch (krip'tō-brang'), a. and n. 1. a. Same as cryptobranchia.

II. n. An animal with covered or concealed gills, as a crustacean, mollusk, or reptile.

Cryptobranchia (krip-tō-brang'-ki-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of cryptobranchia, having concealed gills; see cryptobranchia.] A group of animals having concealed gills. Specifically—(a) A division of crustaceans, including the decapods. (b) A division of gastropods (the typical Dorididae) having the branchia combined in a single retractile crown. (c) A subclass of gastropods, containing most of the class contrasted with Pulmonobranchia and Nudibranchia. J. B. Gray, 1831. (d) The pteropods considered as a suborder of diocious gastropods. Dunham, 1830. (e) A division of urodele amphibians. Also Cryptobranchia in all senses.

cryptobranchiate (krip-tō-brang'-ki-tā), a. [Cf. NL. cryptobranchia, < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + βράχια, gills.] Having hidden gills; having the branchia concealed; specifically, of or pertaining to the Cryptobranchia in any sense. Also cryptobranch.

Cryptobranchidae (krip-tō-brang'-ki-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Cryptobranchia + -idae.] A family of cryptobranchiate or derotreme urodele amphibians; synonymous with Menopomidae (which see). It contains the genera Amphiuma, Menopoma, and Stenobdella or Cryptobranchus.

Cryptobranchus (krip-tō-brang'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + βράχος, in pl. equiv. to βράχια, gills.] The typical genus of the family Cryptobranchidae, containing the gigantic salamander of Japan, Cryptobranchus maximus, which sometimes attains a length of 6 feet, and is the largest living amphibian. The genus is better known under the name of Stolobdia.

Crypto-Calvinist (krip-tō-kal'-vin-ist), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + Calvinist.] One who is secretly a Calvinist: a term applied in Germany in the sixteenth century by the orthodox Lutherans to the Philippists or Melancthonians, followers of Philip Melancthon. They were accused of being secretly Calvinists, because they maintained the Calvinist view of the eucharist, rejecting Luther's doctrine of consubstantiation (as it was called by them).

Crypto-Calvinistic (krip-tō-kal'-vin-is'tik), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + Calvinist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Crypto-Calvinists: as, Crypto-Calvinistic doctrines; the Crypto-Calvinistic controversy (a violent debate carried on during nearly the last fifty years of the sixteenth century).

cryptocarp (krip-tō-kārp), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + καρπός, fruit.] In algology, same as cystocarp.

Cryptocarpace (krip-tō-kār-pēs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + καρπός, fruit.] One of two prime divisions of aculeata, made by Eschscholtz in 1829, containing those with inward or concealed genitalia. They are more fully called Diocophora cryptocarpae, as distinguished from Diocophora phanerocarpeae, and correspond to the modern group Hydromedusa, though the character implied in the name does not always exist. Apodes is a synonym.

cryptocarpic (krip-tō-kār-pik), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + καρπός, fruit.] Pertaining to or effected by means of cryptocarps or cystocarps.

cryptocarpous (krip-tō-kār-pus), a. [As Cryptocarpace + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cryptocarpace; not phanerocarpaceous.

Cryptoccephalus (krip-tō-sef'-al'-i-dēs), n. pl. [NL., < Cryptoccephalus + -idae.] A family of phytophagous tetramerous beetles, typified by the genus Cryptoccephalus. It is related to the Chrysomelidae, in which it is sometimes merged.

cryptoccephalous (krip-tō-sef'-a-lus), a. [As Cryptoccephalus + -ous.] Having the head concealed.

Cryptoccephalus (krip-tō-sef'-a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + κεφαλή, head.] 1. A genus of beetles, referred to the family Chrysomelidae, or made the type of a family Cryptoccephalidae. C. sericus is a small beetle, about a quarter of an inch long, of a brilliant golden-green color, abundant in Great Britain. C. lineola is a glossy black species, with red elytra bordered with black. 2. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + κεφαλή, head.] A monster whose head is excessively small and does not appear externally. Dunghoon.

Cryptocerata (krip-tō-ser'-g-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + κέρα, pl. κέρατα, horn.] A division of heteropterous hemipterous insects, including the aquatic families Notonectidae, Nepidae, and Galgulidae: opposed to Gymnocerata. Also called Hydrocorrea.

cryptocerous (krip-tō-ser'-g-rus), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + κέρα, horn, + -ous.] Having concealed antennae; specifically, of or pertaining to the Cryptocerata.

Cryptochirus (krip-tō-kī'-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + χείρ, the hand.] A genus of brachyurous decapod crustaceans, of the series Oxyopodoidea. The species live on corals, and are provided with a kind of pouch for the eggs and young.

Cryptochirus prefers to make his home in the more solid corals, where the young, settling down in the centre of a young polyp, kills it, while the surrounding polyps continuing to grow soon build a tubular dwelling for the crab. Stand. Nat. Hist., II. 64.

Cryptochiton (krip-tōk'-i-ton), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1847), < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + χiton, chiton.] A genus of polyplacophorous mollusks, or chitons. C. stellata is an example.

crypto-Christian (krip-tō-kris'-tī-an), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + Christian.] One who is secretly a Christian.

Those Jews became Christians in apostolic times who were already what may be called crypto-Christians. J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 468.

Cryptocochlides (krip-tō-kōk'-li-dēs), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille, 1826), < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + κοχλίας, shell.] A section of pectinibranchiate gastropods, proposed for the genus Sigareta.

cryptocrystalline (krip-tō-kris'-tā-lin), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + crystalline.] Indistinctly or imperfectly crystalline: used of a mineral whose structure is so fine that its crystalline character is not apparent to the eye, or which is semi-amorphous; also of a rock, or of its base, in which no definite character is discernible in the constituent particles, even with the microscope. See microcrystalline.

cryptocrystallization (krip-tō-kris'-tā-lī-sā-shun), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + crystallization.] Crystallization yielding a crypto-crystalline structure.

crypto-deist (krip-tō-dē-ist), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + deist.] One who is secretly a deist. He [Thomas Paine] was already a crypto-deist. N. Z. Oakenham, Short Studies, p. 244.

Cryptodibranchia (krip-tō-di-brang'-ki-ā), n. pl. [NL. (De Blainville, 1814), < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + NL. Dibranchia.] An order of cephaloporous mollusks containing all the cephalopoda: later called Cryptodibranchiata, and limited in range.

Cryptodibranchiata (krip-tō-di-brang'-ki-ā-tā), n. pl. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + NL. Dibranchiata, q. v.] In De Blainville's system of classification (1824), an order of cephalopoda, containing the dibranchiata forms: same as Acetabulifera and Dibranchiata.

cryptodibranchiate (krip-tō-di-brang'-ki-āt), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cryptodibranchiata; dibranchiate or acetabuliferous, as a cephalopod.

cryptodidymus (krip-tō-did'-i-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + δίδυμος, a twin.] In teratology, a monstrosity in which one fetus is found contained in another. Dunghoon.

cryptodirus (krip-tō-dī-rus), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + δέρμη, the neck, throat, + -ous.] Having a concealed or concealable neck, as a tortoise in which the neck is so completely retractile that the head can be directly withdrawn into the shell: opposed to pleurodirus.

Cryptodon (krip-tō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + δόντις, Ionic δόν (δόντις) = E. tooth.] A genus of siphonate bivalve mollusks, of the family Lucinidae, having no hinge-teeth, whence the name.

cryptodont (krip-tō-dont), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + δόντις (δόντις) = E. tooth.] Having concealed teeth, or not known to have teeth; specifically, pertaining to the Cryptodonta or Cryptodontia.

Cryptodontia (krip-tō-don'ti-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. (as Gr.) of cryptodont (t): see cryptodont.] In conch., a section or order of paleozoic bivalve mollusks, having the thin shell cryptodont, two ciboria, and entire pallial line.

Cryptodontia (krip-tō-don'ti-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. (as L.) of cryptodont (t): see cryptodont.] In Owen's system of classification, a family of extinct reptiles, of the order Anomodontia, having both jaws toothless. It contains the genera Rhynchonotus and Oudenodon, thus distinguished from Dicynodon.

cryptogam (krip-tō-gam), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γάμος, marriage.] A cryptogamous plant; a plant of the class Cryptogamia.

Cryptogamia (krip-tō-gā-mī-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of **cryptogamus*, equiv. to cryptogamus, having an obscure mode of fertilization: see cryptogamous and cryptogamy.] In bot., in the Linnæan system of classification, the second great series and final class, which included all plants in which there were no stamens and pistils, and therefore no proper flowers: thus distinguished from the first series, Phanogamia. The name remains in general use, and the group is further characterized by the absence of a seed containing an embryo. The organs and methods of reproduction vary greatly, in some cases being closely analogous to those of phanogamous plants, while in the lowest no sexual character whatever is distinguishable. As improvements in the microscope have made possible a more thorough study of the Cryptogamia, their classification has been gradually modified and perfected, but it still remains to some extent unsettled, especially in regard to the lower groups. A division into higher and lower cryptogams is often made, corresponding to the acrogamia and amphigamia classes of De Candoille's arrangement, otherwise known as acrogens and thallogens. The first group are either vascular (including the Filices, Marattiaceae, and their allies, also called Phytophytes) or cellular (including the Hepaticae and Musci, unitedly called Bryophytes). The lower cryptogams are wholly cellular, and are variously subdivided, the usual division being into algae, Lichenes, and Fungi. (See acrogamia and amphigamia.) The number of known species is very large. In conch., within this group, alone are nearly twice as numerous as in the phanogamia. It is probable that in less explored regions many species are yet undiscovered.

cryptogamian (krip-tō-gā-mī-an), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γάμος, marriage.] Same as cryptogamous.

cryptogamic (krip-tō-gam-ik), a. [As cryptogam + -ic.] Pertaining or relating to the Cryptogamia; cryptogamous: as, cryptogamic botany.

There is good reason to believe that the first plants which appeared on this earth were cryptogamic. Darwin, Cross and Self Fertilization, p. 402.

cryptogamist (krip-tō-gā-mist), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γάμος, marriage.] One who is skilled in cryptogamic botany.

cryptogamous (krip-tō-gā-mus), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γάμος, marriage.] Having an obscure mode of fertilization, < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, obscure, + γάμος, marriage.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cryptogamia. Also cryptogamic. cryptogamy (krip-tō-gā-mī), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γάμος, marriage.] Obscure fructification, as in plants of the class Cryptogamia. See Cryptogamia.

cryptogram (krip-tō-gram), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γράμμα, a writing, < γράφω, write.] A message or writing in secret characters or otherwise occult; a cryptograph.

cryptograph (krip-tō-grāf), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + γράφω, write.] 1. Something written in secret characters or cipher.—2. A system of secret writing; a cipher.

cryptographic (krip-tō-grā-fik), a. [As cryptograph + -al.] Cryptographic. Boyle. cryptographer (krip-tō-grā-fēr), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γράφω, write.] One who writes in secret characters.

cryptographic, cryptographical (krip-tō-grā-fik, -i-kal), a. [As cryptograph + -ic, -ical.] 1. Written in secret characters or in cipher: as, a cryptographic despatch.—2. Designed or contrived for writing in secret characters: as, a cryptographic machine.

cryptography (krip-tō-grā-fī), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + γραφία, < γράφω, write.] 1. The act or art of writing in secret characters.—2. A system of secret or occult characters; that which is written in cipher.

The strange cryptography of Gaffarel in his Starry Book of Heaven. Sir T. Browne, Garden of Cyrus, III.

All which relates to the spirits, their names, speeches, shows, noises, clothing, actions, &c., were all cryptography: feigned relations, concealing true ones of a very different nature.

Hooker, in I. D'Israeli's Amen. of Lit., II. 811.

Cryptohypnus (krip-tō-hīp'-nus), n. [NL. (Eschscholtz, 1836), irreg. < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + υπνός = L. somnus, sleep.] A genus of click-beetles, of the family Elatridae, distinguished principally by the distinctly securiform terminal joint of the palpi, and the very short and oval, almost round, scutellum. It is a very large and wide-spread genus, comprising upward of 100 species, of which 34 are from North America. The smallest species of the family are found in this genus. C. minutissimus measuring less than one millimeter in length. The color is usually uniform black or yellowish-brown.

cryptolite (krip-tō-līt), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + λίθος, stone.] A phosphate of cerium, occurring in minute crystals or grains embedded in the apatite of Arendal, Norway.

cryptology (krip-tō-lō-jī), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + λογία, < λέγω, speak.] Secret or occult language; cryptography.

Cryptomonadina (krip-tō-mon-ā-dī-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + μονάδα (μονάδα) = unit, + -ina.] 1. In Ehrenberg's system of classification (1836), a family of loricate infusorians of persistent form, undergoing complete fission and lacking an intestine and appendages.—2. In Stein's system (1878), a family of flagellate infusorians, represented by the genera Orythmonas, Chilomonas, and Nephroselmis.

cryptomonadine (krip-tō-mon-ā-dī-n), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cryptomonadina.

cryptomorphite (krip-tō-mōr-fīt), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + μορφή, form, + -itis.] A hydrous borate of calcium and sodium, occurring in white kernels with microcrystalline texture. Crypton, n. See krypton.

Cryptomonas (krip-tō-nā-mī'-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + μονάδα, thread.] A sub-order of the Floricornes among Algae, including about 150 species, mostly inhabiting warm seas. They are of purplish or rose-red color, with generally 8

Cryptophagus rubens,

1. Female, with outer integument removed: a, labrum;
f, palpi; g, outer maxilla;
A, rudimentary maxilliped;
A & a, wall of eye continued into rim of the aperture a, b; c, st. abdominal seta; A, ap-pendage. x Male.

The name is retained as the designation of one of the several genera into which the family Pyraustidae is now divided, containing such species as C. cinereus, C. pilosus, C. taenipennis, etc. See Pyraustidae.

krýptus (kríp'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden: see crypt.] A genus of Ichneumonidae, Cryptus extrematus.

a, female of C. extrematus (line above, natural size); b, enlarged abdomen of C. cinereus, female; c, enlarged abdomen of C. extrematus, male; d, enlarged portion of wing of same.

of the family Ichneumonidae, typical of the subfamily Cryptinae. C. extrematus is a species which infests the American silkworm.

crystal (kris'tál), n. and a. [Formerly crystal, also often erroneously crystal, crystal, etc., now acc. to L. spelling; < ME. crystal, crystal, < OF. crystal, F. crystal = Pr. Sp. crystal = Pg. crystal = It. cristallo = AS. crystal = D. kristal = OHG. crystal, MHG. kristalle, fem., kristall, masc., G. krySTALL, kristall, masc., = Dan. kryстал = Sw. kristall, < L. crystallum, ice, crystal, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, clear ice, ice, also rock-crystal (so called from its resemblance to ice, of which it was supposed to be a modified and permanent form); < κρυσταλλειν, freeze, < κρύος, cold, frost.] L. n. 1. In chem. and mineral, a body which, by the operation of molecular attraction, has assumed a definite internal structure with the form of a regular solid inclosed by a certain number of plane surfaces arranged according to the laws of symmetry. The internal structure is exhibited in the cleavage, in the behavior of sections in polarized light, etc. The external form is discussed under crystallography (which see). Crystals are obtained in the laboratory either by fusing substances by heat and allowing them gradually to cool, or by dissolving them in a fluid and then abstracting the latter by slow evaporation; also by the direct condensation of a vapor produced by sublimation, as in the case of arsenious acid, in the same way that snow-crystals are formed directly from water-vapor in the upper atmosphere. The name was first applied to the transparent varieties of quartz, specifically called rock-crystal.

There was a sea of glass like unto crystal. Rev. iv. 6. The term crystal is now applied to all symmetrical solid shapes assumed spontaneously by lifeless matter.

Huxley, Physiology, p. 58.

2. Glass. (a) Glass of a high degree of transparency and freedom from color. It is heavier than ordinary glass, because containing much oxide of lead. (b) Fine glass used for table-vessels or other table-service, or for ornamental pieces. The term is sometimes used as synonymous with cut glass. (c) The glass cover of a watch-case.

3. A substance resembling rock-crystal or glass in its properties, especially in transparency and clearness.

Every man in this age has not a soul of crystal, for all men to read their actions through. Brau. and Fl., Philaster, l. 1.

4. In her., the color white: said of that color when described in blazoning a nobleman's escutcheon, according to the system of blazoning by precious stones; pearl, however, is more commonly used.—5. A very fine wide white durant, once used for making nuns' veils.—Axis of a crystal. See axial and crystallography.—Charcot's crystals. In pathol., colorless octahedral or rhomboidal crystals found in the sputum of asthmatic and bronchitic patients.—Crystals of Venus. Crystallized neutral acetate of copper. [Venus is here used as a symbol of copper (with allusion to Cyprius).] Distorted crystal. A crystal whose form varies more or less from the ideal geometrical solid which its symmetry requires. This is due to the extension of certain faces at the expense of others during the growth of the crystal, but in general without altering the interfacial angles. In fact, all crystals are more or less distorted.—Embedded crystals. Crystals enveloped within the mass of a rock or other mineral.—Geonitiated crystal. A twin or compound crystal, consisting of two or more parts bent at an angle to one another, as is common with the mineral rutile.—Iceland crystal. A variety of calcite or crystallized calcium carbonate brought from Iceland, remarkable for its transparency.—Implanted crystals. Crystals which project from the free surface of a rock upon which they have been formed.—Negative crystal. (a) A cavity in a mineral mass having the form of a crystal, commonly that peculiar to the mineral itself. (b) In optics. See refraction.—Pink crystals. Name as pink salts. See salts.—Plastic crystal. A trade-name for a kind of Portland cement composed of silica and alumina and traces of oxide of iron, lime, magnesia, and some alkali.—Positive crystal. In optics. See refraction.—Pseudomorphous crystal. See pseudomorph.—Replaced crystal. A crystal having one plane or more in the place of each of its edges or angles.—Rock-crystal, or mountain crystal. A general name for all the transparent crystals of quartz, particularly of limpid or colorless quartz. From their brilliancy such crystals are often popularly called diamonds, as Lake George diamonds, Kristal diamonds, etc.—Twin crystal. See twin.

II. a. Consisting of crystal, or like crystal; clear; transparent; pellucid.

His mistress
Did hold his eyes lock'd in her crystal looks.
Shak., T. G. of V., II. 4.

By crystal streams that murmur through the meads.
Dryden.

In crystal currents of clear morning seas.
Tennyson, Princess, II.

Crystal Palace, the large building, composed chiefly of glass and iron, erected in Hyde Park, London, for the universal exhibition of 1851, and subsequently re-erected at Sydenham, near London, as a permanent institution for public instruction and entertainment. The name has since been applied to other structures of like character.—Crystal violet, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, resembling ordinary methyl violet in its application.

crystallic (kris-tál'ik), a. [< crystal + -ic.] Pertaining to crystals or crystallization: as, crystallic force. Ashburner.

crystalliferous (kris-tál-lif'g-rus), a. [< L. crystallum, crystal, + ferre, = E. bear, + -ous.] Bearing or containing crystals.

crystalligerous (kris-tál-lif'g-rus), a. [< L. crystallum, crystal, + gerere, bear, + -ous.] Bearing crystals: specifically applied to those spores of radiolarians which contain crystals.

In those individuals which produce crystalligerous swarm-spores, each spore encloses a small crystal.
E. H. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 862.

crystallin (kris'tá-lín), n. [< crystal + -in.] 1. An albuminoid substance contained in the crystalline lens of the eye: same as globulin.—2. In chem., an old name for aniline.

crystalline (kris'tá-lín or -lín), a. and n. [= F. cristallin = Pr. cristallin = Sp. cristalino = Pg. crystalino = It. cristallino = J. kristallijn = MHG. kristallin, G. krySTALLIN (cf. Dan. krySTALLIN, G. krySTALLIN; Sw. kristallisk), < L. crystallinus, < Gr. κρυστάλλινος, < κρυσταλλος, clear ice, crystal: see crystal.] L. a. 1. Consisting of crystal.

Mount, eagle, to my palace crystalline.
Shak., Cymbeline, v. 4.

2. Relating or pertaining to crystals or crystallization.

Snow being apparently frozen cloud or vapour, aggregated by a confused action of crystalline laws. Whewell.

3. Formed by crystallization; of the nature of a crystal, especially as regards its internal structure, cleavage, etc.: opposed to amorphous.

The most definite of the properties of perfect chemical compounds is their crystalline structure.
Whewell, Hist. Scientific Ideas, II. 28.

It [ice] is composed of crystalline particles, which, though in contact with one another, are, however, not packed together so as to occupy the least possible space.
J. Croli, (Climate and Cosmology, p. 252.

4. Resembling crystal; pure; clear; transparent; pellucid: specifically applied in anatomy to several structures, as the crystalline humor, cones, etc. See below.

He on the wings of cherub rode sublime,
On the crystalline sky. Milton, P. L., vi. 772.

5. In entom., reflecting light like glass: specifically applied to the ocelli or simple eyes when they are apparently colorless, resembling glass.—Crystalline cones. See crystalline rods.—Crystalline heavens. In the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, two spheres imagined between the primum mobile, or outer circle of the heavens, which by its motion was supposed to carry around all within it, and the firmament.—Crystalline humor or lens. A lentiform pellucid body, composed of a transparent firm substance inclosed in a membranous capsule, and situated in front of the vitreous body and behind the iris of the eye. It is doubly convex, but the posterior surface is more convex than the anterior. The central part is more dense and firm than the exterior parts, and is made up of concentric lamellae. It is of high refracting power, and serves to produce that refraction of the rays of light which is necessary to cause them to meet in the retina and form a perfect image there. See cut under eye.—Crystalline rods. Crystalline cones. Cells specially modified as refractive bodies, forming the end-organs of the nervous apparatus of vision of the Arthropoda.

Each group separates off a transparent highly refractive substance, which forms the so-called crystalline cone. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 264.

Crystalline style, a flexible, transparent body of gritty appearance and unknown function, contained in the pharyngeal oesum of bivalve mollusks, as species of Melema.—Crystalline ware, a name given by Josiah Wedgwood to fine pottery of his manufacture veined in imitation of natural semi-precious stones, the veining generally going through the paste. Compare granite-ware, agate-ware.

II. n. A crystallized rock, or one only partially crystallized, as granite.

crystallinity (kris-tá-lín'í-ti), n. [< crystalline + -ity.] The character or state of being crystalline; crystalline structure.

The tendency to crystallinity observable in large masses of cast metal.
Bryce, Brit., XIII. 265.

crystallisability, crystallisable, etc. See crystallisability, etc.

crystallite (kris'tá-lit), n. [< Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -itis.] 1. Whinstone cooled slowly after fusion.—2. The term suggested by Vogel-sang as a general name for aggregations of globulites in various forms. See omulite, margarite, and longulite. These terms are used exclusively in describing various groupings of minute drop-like bodies (globulites), seen under the microscope in thin sections of rocks. See globulite.

crystallitis (kris'tá-lit'is), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal (crystalline lens), + -itis.] In pathol., phacitis. Dunglison.

crystallizability (kris'tá-liz-áb-il'í-ti), n. The quality of being crystallizable; capability of being crystallized. Also spelled crystallisability.

The ready crystallizability of alumn. Ure, Dict., I. 125.

crystallizable (kris'tá-liz-áb-il), a. [= F. cristallisable = Sp. cristallizable; as crystallisable + -able.] Capable of being crystallized or of assuming a crystalline structure. Also spelled crystallisable.

crystallisation (kris'tá-liz-á-shon), n. [= F. cristallisation = Sp. cristalizacion = Pg. cristallizacão = It. cristallizzazione = 1). Crystallisation; as crystallisation + -ation.] 1. The process by which the molecules of a substance which is in the state of a liquid (or vapor) unite in regular (crystalline) form when it solidifies by cooling or evaporation. If the process is slow and undisturbed, the molecules assume a regular arrangement, each substance taking a determinate form according to its natural laws, but if the process is rapid or disturbed, the external form may be more or less irregular. An amorphous solid body may also undergo partial crystallization by a molecular rearrangement, giving it a more or less complete crystalline structure, as, for instance, in the iron of a railroad-bridge after long use. See crystallography.

2. The mass or body formed by the process of crystallization.

Also spelled crystallization. Alternate crystallization, a species of crystallization which takes place when several crystallizable substances having little affinity for one another are present in the same solution. The substance which is largest in quantity and least soluble crystallizes first, in part; the least soluble substance next in quantity then begins to crystallize; and thus different substances, as salts, are often deposited in successive layers from the same solution.—Water of crystallization, water which is held by certain salts as a part of their crystalline structure, but is not inherent in the molecule. Thus, common sodium carbonate, when it crystallizes from a solution, contains for each molecule of sodium carbonate ten molecules of water. This is so weakly held that it escapes as vapor in dry air at ordinary temperatures. The crystalline form of the salt often depends on the number of molecules of water which the crystals contain. Water of crystallization differs from combined water in that it does not belong to the molecular structure, but only to the crystalline structure, of the substance.

crystallize (kris'tá-liz), v.; prét. and pp. crystallized, ppr. crystallising. [= F. cristalliser = Sp. cristalizar = Pg. cristallizar = It. cristallizzare = D. kristalliseren = G. kristallisieren = Dan. krySTALLISERE = Sw. kristallisera; as crystal + -ize. Cf. Gr. κρυστάλλιζω, be clear as crystal.] L. trans. 1. To cause to assume a crystalline structure or shape; form into crystals: often used figuratively.

Bodies which are perfectly crystallized exhibit the most complete regularity and symmetry of form.
Whewell, Hist. Scientific Ideas, I. 265.

Around the Academy are crystallized several literary enterprises, the fame of which is reflected upon it.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 28.

2. To change to the state of crystal. [Rare.]

When the Winters keener breath began To crystallize the Baltic Ocean,
To glaze the Lakes.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Handy-Crafts

II. intrans. 1. To be converted into a crystal; unite, as the separate particles of a substance, and form a regular solid.—2. Figuratively—(a) To assume a definite form and fixity, as an opinion, view, or idea, at first indeterminate or vague; take substantial and definite shape: as, public opinion on this subject is beginning to crystallize.

There is ever a tendency of the most hurtful kind to allow opinions to crystallize into creeds.
Jevons, Pol. Econ., p. 206.

(b) To assume (as a number of opinions, views, or ideas, at first unsettled or diverse) a definite form, and become concentrated upon or collected round a given subject.

Also spelled crystallise.

crystalliser (kris'ta-lī-sēr), n. That which causes or assists in crystallization; something employed in a process of crystallisation. Also spelled crystallizer.

They (boilers) may be emptied at pleasure into lower receivers, called crystallizers, by means of leaden syphons and long-necked funnels.

Ure, Dict., I. 150.

crystalloid (kris'ta-lōid), n. [< crystal(l) + od.] The od of crystals, or a supposed odic force derived from crystallization. See od.

Instead of saying the "od derived from crystallization," we may name this product crystalloid.

Riesbeck, Dynamism (trans. 1851), p. 294.

crystallo-engraving (kris'ta-lō-en-grā'ving), n. A method of ornamenting glass by means of casts of a design which are placed on the inner surface of the metal mold in which the glass vessel is formed, become embedded in the surface of the glass, and are removed with it. When the material forming the cast is separated from the glass vessel, the design is left in intaglio.

crystallogenic, crystallogenical (kris'ta-lō-jen'ik, -i-kal), a. [< crystallogeny + -ic, -ical.] Relating to crystallogeny; crystal-producing: as, crystallogenic attraction.

crystallogeny (kris'ta-lōj'e-ni), n. [= F. cristallogénie, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -γενεα, < -γενε, producing.] In crystal., that department of science which treats of the production of crystals.

crystallographer (kris'ta-lōg'rā-fēr), n. [As crystallography + -er.] One who describes crystals or the manner of their formation.

In the present condition of science, minerals, considered as such, and not as geological materials, fall rather within the province of the chemist and crystallographer.

H. Forbes, Literary Papers, p. 165.

crystallographic, crystallographical (kris'ta-lō-grāf'ik, -i-kal), a. [= F. cristallographique; as crystallography + -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to crystallography.

When a beam of light passes . . . through Iceland spar parallel to the crystallographic axis, there is no double refraction.

Tyndall, Light and Heat, p. 103.

crystallographically (kris'ta-lō-grāf'ik-al-i), adv. With regard to crystallography or its principles; as in crystallography. Whewell.

crystallography (kris'ta-lōg'rā-fī), n. [= F. cristallographie = Sp. cristalografía = Pg. cristallographia = It. cristallografia = D. kristallografie = Dan. kristallografi, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] 1. The science of the process of crystallization, and of the forms and structure of crystals. The following are the generally adopted systems of crystallization, based upon the degree of symmetry which characterizes the different forms, but defined according to the length and inclination of the assumed axes: (a) the isometric, characterized by three rectangular axes, all of equal length; (b) the tetragonal, by three rectangular axes, two of which are of equal length; (c) the rhombic (and rhomboidal), by four axes, three of equal length, in the same plane, and inclined to one another at an angle of 60°, the fourth of different length, and at right angles to the plane of the other three; (d) the orthorhombic, by three rectangular axes of unequal length; (e) the monoclinic, by three axes, two at right angles to each other, and the third perpendicular to one and oblique to the other; and (f) the triclinic, by three axes, all oblique to one another. (See these names.) Instead of isometric, the terms monometric, cubic, and regular are sometimes used; instead of tetragonal, dimeric; instead of orthorhombic, trimetric or rhombic; instead of monoclinic, monosymmetric or oblique; and instead of triclinic, asymmetric or anorthic. The isometric, tetragonal, and orthorhombic systems are sometimes spoken of collectively as orthometric, and the monoclinic and triclinic as dimeric; similarly the tetragonal and hexagonal systems have been called isodimeric. The study of crystallography is of great importance to the chemist and mineralogist, as the nature of many substances may be ascertained from an inspection of the forms of their crystals.

2. A discourse or treatise on crystals and crystallization.

crystalloid (kris'ta-lōid), a. and n. [= F. cristalloïde = It. cristalloide, < Gr. κρυσταλλοειδής, < κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -ειδής, shape.] 1. a. Resembling a crystal.

The grouping . . . of a number of smaller crystalloid molecules.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 6.

II. n. 1. The name given by Professor Graham to a class of bodies which have the power, when in solution, of passing easily through membranes, as parchment-paper, and which he found to be of a crystalline character. Metallic salts and organic bodies, as sugar, morphine, and oxalic acid, are crystalloids. They are the opposite of colloids, which have not this permeating power. See colloid.

The relatively small-atomed crystalloids have immensely greater diffusive power than the relatively large-atomed colloids.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 7.

2. A protein crystal—that is, a granule of protein in the form of a crystal, differing from an organic crystal in the inconstancy of its angles and in its property of swelling when immersed in water. Such crystalloids are of various forms and usually colorless.

crystalloidal (kris'ta-lōi'dal), a. [< crystalloid + -al.] Of or pertaining to or of the nature of a crystalloid.

The same condition could be produced by nearly all crystalloidal substances.

B. W. Richardson, Prevent. Med., p. 90.

crystallogology (kris'ta-lōj'ō-jī), n. [= F. cristallologie = Pg. cristalogogia, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science which considers the structure of bodies in inorganic nature so far as it is the result of cohesive attraction. It embraces crystallography, which treats of the geometrical form of crystals, and crystallogeny, which discusses their origin and method of formation.

crystallogmagnetic (kris'ta-lō-mag-net'ik), a. [< Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + μάγνης (μαγνη-), magnet, + -ic.] Pertaining to the magnetic properties of crystallized bodies, especially the behavior of a crystal in a magnetic field; as, "crystallogmagnetic action," Encyc. Brit., XVI. 377.

crystallogmancy (kris'ta-lō-man-sī), n. [= F. cristallomanie, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + μανία, divination.] A mode of divining by means of a transparent body, as a precious stone, crystal globe, etc., formerly in high esteem. The operator first muttered over the crystal (a beryl was preferred) certain formulas of prayer, and then gave it into the hands of a young man or a virgin, who thereupon, by oral communication from spirits in the crystal, or by written characters as in it, was supposed to receive the information desired.

crystallogmetry (kris'ta-lōm'e-trī), n. [= F. cristallométrie, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -μετρία, < μέτρον, a measure.] The art or process of measuring the forms of crystals.

Crystallogmetry was early recognized as an authorized test of the difference of the substances which nearly resembled each other.

crystallogtype (kris'ta-lō-tīp), n. [< Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + τύπος, impression.] In photog., a photographic picture on a translucent material, as glass.

crystallogurgy (kris'ta-lōr-jī), n. [< Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + εργον = E. work.] The process of crystallization.

crystalwort (kris'ta-l-wért), n. One of the Hepaticæ of the suborder Ricciaceæ.

III. The chemical symbol of caesium.

O. S. An abbreviation of (a) Court of Session; (b) Clerk of the Signet; (c) Custos Signilli, Keeper of the Seal; (d) con sordini (which see).

O. S. A. An abbreviation of (a) Confederate States of America; (b) Confederate States Army.

O. S. N. An abbreviation of Confederate States Navy.

C-spring (sē'spring), n. A carriage-spring shaped like the letter C.

ct. An abbreviation of (a) cent; (b) count; (c) court.

ctenidia, n. Plural of ctenidium.

ctenidial (te-nid'i-al), a. [< ctenidium + -al.] Pertaining to or having the characters of a ctenidium: as, ctenidial gills or plumes; ctenidial respiration.

ctenidiobranchia (te-nid'i-ō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κτενίδιον, a little comb (see ctenidium), + βράχια, gills.] Same as ctenidiobranchiata.

ctenidiobranchiata (te-nid'i-ō-brang'ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of ctenidiobranchiatus: see ctenidiobranchiata.] 1. A suborder or superfamily of xygobranchiate gastropods, having paired ctenidia functioning as gills. It contains the Hahobidae and Fessurellidae, or sea-eels and keyhole-limpets.—2. A suborder of palliate or tectibranchiate opisthobranchiate gastropods, containing those which retain the ctenidia as functional gills, as the Tornatellidae, Bullidae, Aplysiidae, etc.

ctenidiobranchiate (te-nid'i-ō-brang'ki-ā'tē), a. [NL., < ctenidiobranchiatus; as Ctenidiobranchia + -atus: see -ate.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ctenidiobranchiata.

ctenidium (te-nid'i-um), n.; pl. ctenidia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. κτενίδιον, dim. of κτενίς (κτεν-), a comb.] One of the gill-combs, gill-plumes, or primitive branchial organs of mollusks; the respiratory organ of a mollusk in a generalized stage of development. A ctenidium is always a gill, but a gill may not be a ctenidium, since a respiratory function may be assumed by some part of the body which is not ctenidial in a morphological sense.

On either side of the neck there may be seen an oval yellowish body, the rudimentary gills or ctenidia.

Trans. Roy. Soc. of Edinburgh, XXXII. 604.

Otenisa (te-ni'sā), n. [NL., irreg. < (Gr. κτενίς, κτεν, comb, < κτενίς (κτεν-), a comb.) A genus of spiders, of the family Mygalidae. The species are of large size, and are among those known as trap-door spiders, such as C. orientalis of Europe and C. californica of the western United States. They are remarkable for forming in the ground a habitation consisting of a long cylindrical tube, protected at the top by a circular door, which is connected to the tube by a huge. The lid is made of alternate layers of earth and web, and when shut can scarcely be distinguished from the surrounding soil.

ctenobranch (ten'ō-brang'k), a. and n. [< (Ctenobranchia).] 1. a. Having a pectinate gill; ctenobranchiate.

II. n. A ctenobranchiate gastropod; one of the Ctenobranchiata.

Are we to accept this view of Lankoster and to consider the gill as we find it in most ctenobranchs derived from a ctenidium by modification, or shall we regard the common form of ctenobranch gill as the most primitive?

Biol. Lab. of Johns Hopkins, III. 44.

Otenobranchia (ten'ō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < (Gr. κτενίς (κτεν-), a comb, + βράχια, gills.] Same as Ctenobranchiata.

Otenobranchiata (ten'ō-brang'ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of ctenobranchiatus: see ctenobranchiata.] In Van der Hoeven's classification, the tenth family of mollusks, characterised by spiral shells, and by having the branchial cavity (in which there are sometimes three branchia, sometimes two, and sometimes only one) composed of numerous leaves like the teeth of a comb, and contained in the last turn of the shell. They have two tentacles and two eyes, the latter often pedicellate. The sexes are separate, and the external organs of generation are distinct. There are both fresh- and salt-water species. The whole is the best-known member of the family. The Ctenobranchiata are now regarded as a suborder of prosobranchiate gastropods, containing upward of 20 families. Also called Pectinobranchiata (which see).

ctenobranchiate (ten'ō-brang'ki-ā'tē), a. [< NL. ctenobranchiatus; as Ctenobranchia + -atus: see -ate.] Having pectinate gills; specifically, pertaining to the Ctenobranchiata.

ctenocyst (ten'ō-sist), n. [NL., < (Gr. κτενίς (κτεν-), comb, + κύστις, a bladder (cyst).] The characteristic sense-organ of the ctenophorans, regarded as probably an auditory capsule; a large vesicle situated at the aboral pole, with a clear fluid and vibratile otoliths. See Ctenophora.

ctenodactyl, ctenodactyle (ten'ō-dak'til), n. An animal of the genus Ctenodactylus.

Otenodactylus (ten'ō-dak'ti-l'us), n. pl. [NL., < Ctenodactylus + -us.] A subfamily of hystericomorph rodents, of the family Octodontidae; the comb-rats, so called from the comb-like fringing of the toes. They are exceptional among the hystericomorph animals in not having four back teeth above and below on each side. In Ctenodactylus the molars are three in each half jaw above and below, there being no premolars; and in Prestator, the only other genus, these teeth are minute. The Ctenodactylinae have some relationship with the jerboas, though totally different in appearance. They are confined to Africa.

Otenodactylus (ten'ō-dak'ti-l'us), n. [NL., < Gr. κτενίς (κτεν-), a comb, + δακτύλος, a finger or toe.] The typical genus of the subfamily Otenodactylinae. There is but one species, C. masoni, Mason's comb-rat, also called gundi, about the size of a large member of the genus Arvicola, with very small ears, a mere stump of a tail, and lengthened hind limbs.

Otenodipteridae (ten-ō-dip-ter'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., short for **Otenodontodipteridae*; < Otenodus (-dōnt-) + Dipterus + -ida.] In Günther's system of classification, a family of dipnoous fishes, including forms with a heteroecial caudal fin, gular plates, cycloid scales, and two pairs of molars, as well as one pair of vomerine teeth. The species are extinct, and so far as known, were peculiar to the Devonian age.

Otenodipterine (ten-ō-dip-ter'-in), n. One of the Otenodipterini.

Otenodipterini (ten-ō-dip-ter'-i-ni), n. pl. [NL., short for **Otenodontodipterini*; < Otenodus (-dōnt-) + Dipterus (these two genera composing the group) + -ini.] In Huxley's system of classification, a group of crossopostegian fishes, with etenodont dentition, cycloid scales, and two dorsal fins.

Otenodiscus (ten-ō-dis'-kus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + δίσκος, disk.] A genus of starfishes, of the family Asteriidae, or Asteropectinidae, having a pentagonal form with very short arms. C. crispatus is a North Atlantic species.

Otenodont (ten-ō-dōnt), a. [< Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + ὀνίς (ōni-) = E. tooth.] Possessing etenodont teeth. Huxley.

Otenodus (ten-ō-dus), n. [NL. (Agassiz, 1838), < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + ὀνίς (ōni-) = E. tooth.] In Whitl., a genus of dipnoous fishes having the transverse crests of the teeth armed with short teeth and thus somewhat resembling a comb. The species lived during the Carboniferous and Permian periods.

Otenoid (ten-ō'id), a. and n. [< Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. 1. Comb-like; pectinate: specifically applied—(a) to a form of scales in fishes in which the posterior margin is pectinate, or beset with small spinules (see cut under scales); (b) to a form of dentition in fishes in which the teeth have comb-like ridges.—2. Pertaining to the Otenoidae; having etenoid scales, as a fish.

II. n. A fish with etenoid scales; one of the Otenoidae.

Otenoidean (ten-ō'id-ē-an), a. and n. I. a. Belonging to the order Otenoidae.

II. n. A fish of the order Otenoidae.

Also Otenoidean.

Otenoidae (ten-ō'id-ē-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + εἶδος, form.] In L. Agassiz's system of classification, one of four orders of the class fishes, containing those in which the scales are etenoid or pectinate. It was the third order of Agassiz's early classification, and contrasted with others called Cycloidei, Ganoidei, and Pisces. It comprised most of the acanthopterygians, but proved to be an entirely artificial group, and is not now in use.

Otenoidian (ten-ō'id-ē-an), a. and n. Same as Otenoidean.

Otenolabridae (ten-ō-lab'-ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + ὀνίς (ōni-), a fish.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, supposed to be allied to the Labridae, but having etenoid scales: a disused synonym of Pomacentridae.

Otenolabroid (ten-ō-lab'-roid), a. and n. [< Otenolabrus + -oid.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Otenolabridae.

II. n. A fish of the family Otenolabridae; a pomacentrid. Sir J. Richardson.

Otenolabrus (ten-ō-lā'-brus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + ὀνίς (ōni-), a fish.] A genus of fishes, of the family Labridae, closely related to Labrus, but having a pectinate preoperculum, whence the name. The common cunner is C. asperus. See cut under cunner.

Otenomys (ten-ō-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + μῦς = E. mouse.] A genus of hystriocomorphic rodents, of the family Octodontidae and subfamily Octodontinae: so named from the comb-like fringe of bristles on the hind feet. It contains several South American species of grayish or brownish animals, usually from 8 to 10 inches long, with a tail from 2 to 3 inches in length, small eyes, rudimentary ears, and a stout form. They resemble guinea-pigs, and are highly fossorial, burrowing like moles, or like the Geomys, which they represent in their economy. The best-known species is C. brasiliensis, called tucu-tucu. Another is C. magellanicus.

Otenophor (ten-ō-fōr), a. [NL. Otenophorus, < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + φέρω, -bearing, < φέρω = E. bear.] Comb-bearing: applied to the type of structure represented by the Otenophorans among coelenterates.

The Otenophor type has fundamentally the form of a sphere, beset with eight meridional rows of vibratile plates, which, working like oars, serve for locomotion.

Claus, Zoology (trans.), I. 211.

Otenophora<sup>1</sup> (te-nōf'-ō-rā), n. [NL., fem. sing. of Otenophorus: see Otenophor.] 1. A genus of crane-flies, of the family Tipulidae, characterized by the lateral processes of the antennal joints of the male, whence the name. There are 6 European and 7 North American species. The larvae live in dead wood. The genus was founded by Meigen in 1803.

2. A genus of spiders, of the family Therididae, based by Blackwall in 1870 upon a Sicilian species, C. monticola.

Otenophora<sup>2</sup> (te-nōf'-ō-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of Otenophorus: see Otenophor.] A class of Coelenterata; formerly, an order of acalophs.

They are pellicled gelatinous marine organisms, are radially symmetrical, and swim by means of eight meridional ciliary bands, rows of pectinations on Otenophora, whence the name. In form they are spheroidal or cylindrical, rarely caudate. They possess an esophageal tube and a gastrovascular system, and often two lateral retractile tentacles, but no corallum. They are hermaphrodite, reproduction being by ova discharged through the mouth. A localized sense-organ called a ctenocyst is present. The nematocysts are usually wanting, but are represented by organs known as stinging or prehensile cells, the base of which is a spirally coiled thread, while the free extremity is enlarged, projecting, and glutinous. The Otenophora are divided by some into four orders, Lobata, Tentaculata, Nematata, and Eurytomata; by others directly into a number of families. Such forms as Eurytomata, Centum, Cyrtopne, and Beros are severally characteristic of the main divisions. Also called Ctenophora.

Otenophoral (te-nōf'-ō-rā), a. [As Otenophor + -al.] Comb-bearing: applied to the parts or system of organs of the Otenophorans which bear the fringes.

Otenophoran (te-nōf'-ō-rā), a. and n. [< Otenophora + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Otenophora; having the characters of the Otenophora; Otenophorous. II. n. One of the Otenophora.

An Actinia with only eight mesenteries, and these exceedingly thick, whereby the intermesenteric chambers would be reduced to canals; with two aboral pores instead of the one pore which exists in Ceranthus; and with eight bands of cilia corresponding with the reduced intermesenteric chambers, would have all the essential peculiarities of a Otenophoran.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 164.

Otenophore (ten-ō-fōr), n. [NL. Otenophorus: see Otenophor.] 1. One of the eight fringed or ciliated comb-bearing locomotive organs peculiar to the Otenophora.—2. A member of the class Otenophora; a Otenophoran.

Otenophoric (ten-ō-fōr'-ik), a. [As Otenophor + -ic.] Same as Otenophorous.

Otenophorous (te-nōf'-ō-rus), a. [As Otenophor + -ous.] Pertaining to or resembling the Otenophora.

In early life . . . the Alciopids are parasitic in the Otenophorous coelenterates, but later become free.

Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 428.

Otenophyllum (ten-ō-fil'-um), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A genus of fossil plants, named by Schimper in allusion to the comb-like appearance of the leaflets on the frond. It belongs to the cycads, and occurs in rocks of Liassic and Jurassic age in various parts of Europe. The genus Otenophyllum as instituted by Schimper includes various forms previously referred by authors to Pterophyllum, Pterocarpites, and Zamia.

Otenopyschilus (ten-ōp-tik'-i-us), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + πύχσις, a fold.] A genus of fossil selachians of the Devonian and Carboniferous periods, containing sharks now referred to the family Petalodontidae, but formerly to Cestracodontidae.

Otenostomata (ten-ō-stō-mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + ὄστρον (ōstro-n), mouth.] A division of gymnoleptans polyzoans having the cell-opening closed by marginal setae, and no vibracula nor avicularia. It is represented by the families Vesiculariidae and Alcyonidiidae.

Otenostomatous (ten-ō-stō-mā-tus), a. [< Otenostomata + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Otenostomata: as, a Otenostomatous polyzoan. Also Otenostomatus.

Otenucha (te-nū'-kū), n. [NL. (Kirby, 1857), < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + τέχνη, have.] A genus of moths, of the family Lithosiidae, having 8-jointed palpi, longer than the head, with the first and second equal and the third shorter. It is distinctively a new-world genus, and the species are found in North and South America.

Othalamidae (tha-lam'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Othalamus + -idae.] A family of thoracic cirripedes.

Othalamus (thal'-a-mus), n. [NL., an irreg. form, perhaps a transposition of Othlamalus, < Gr. ὄθραλος, near the ground, low, akin to χαῖμα, on the ground: see chamoleon, etc.] The typical genus of the family Othalamidae.

Ou. The chemical symbol of copper (Latin cuprum).

cuadra (kwā'-drā), n. [Sp., a square, < L. quadra, a square, a bit, piece, prop. fem. of (L.L.) quadrus, square: see quadrate, square.] A linear measure of the states of Spanish South America, but unknown in Spain, and consequently to the metrological handbooks. It was originally 400 feet of castle, afterward 333, and now contains in different states 166, 150, and 80 varas. In the provinces of the Argentine Republic it contains 150 local varas, except in Tucuman, where it has 166. In the United States of Colombia, Uruguay, etc., it contains 100 varas. It is also used as a square measure. The Argentine cuadra contains over 4 English acres, the Uruguayan barely 2.

cuamara (kwa-mā'-rā), n. [Native name.] The wood of Dipteryx odorata, a leguminous tree of British Guiana, which yields the Tonka bean. It is hard, tough, and very durable, and is used for shafts, mill-wheels, cogs, etc.

cuartas (kwā'-tās), n. [< Sp. cuarta, a fourth part, quarter: see quart, quarter.] An inferior kind of Cuban tobacco, used as a filling for cigars. Also called cuartel.

cuartilla (kwā'-tē'-lyā), n. [Sp., dim. of cuarto, fourth: see quart, quarter.] 1. A Spanish measure of capacity, especially for liquids: not to be confounded with the cuartillo. It corresponds to the Arabian makuk, being  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the moyo (Arabian muud) of Valladolid. It derives its name from being the fourth part of the cantara. According to the standard of Toledo it contains 1.06 United States (old wine) gallons (previous to 1801, 4.125 liters); but on the basis of the arrobe menor, used for oil, it is equivalent to only 0.83 of the same gallon.

2. A Spanish dry measure, one fourth of a fanega, equal in Castile to 13.7 liters, or 1½ Winchester pecks. In Buenos Ayres, where it is the chief dry measure, it is 34.32 liters, or 0.97 Winchester bushel. In Entre Rios it is 34.41 liters.

3. A South American measure of land equal to 25,000 square varas.

cuartillo (kwā'-tē'-lyō), n. [Sp., masc. dim. of cuarto, fourth. Cf. cuartilla.] 1. A Spanish liquid measure, one fourth of an asumbre: not to be confounded with the cuartilla. In the last system of Spanish measures it was equal to 0.5042 liter, or 1.06 United States (old wine) pints (previous to 1801, to 0.516 liter); but milk was sold by a cuartillo one fourth larger. 2. Cuartillo of Alicante was larger, being 0.722 liter, or 1.525 United States pints.

3. A dry measure of Spain, one fourth of a celestine, equal to 1.142 liters, or about one sixth of a Winchester peck.—4. A Mexican and South American coin, the fourth part of a real, or about 3½ cents.

cuarto (kwā'-tō), n. [Sp., fourth: see quart, quarter.] 1. A copper coin struck in Spain for circulation in Manila, current as the 160th part of a dollar.—2. A measure of land in Buenos Ayres, since 1870 one fourth of a hectare.

cubl (kub), n. [Origin obscure; not recorded in ME.; perhaps Celtic, < Ir. cub, a cub, whelp, dog (cf. Gael. cuain, a litter of whelps), < Ir. Gael. cu = W. of, a dog, = E. hound.] The native E. word for cub is whelp, q. v.] 1. The young of certain quadrupeds, especially of the bear, fox, and wolf, also of the lion and tiger (more commonly whelp), and rarely of the dog and some others; a puppy; a whelp.—2. A a, mouth; b, stomach; c, infundibulum; d, horizontal canal; e, one of its branches, dividing at f into two branches which open into the longitudinal canal; g, g, parallel with which the ciliated areas run; h, sac of tentacles; i, with one of its branches; j, lateral parallel with stomach; k, ciliated area; l, m, n, o, p, apertures, q, q, on each side of p, the ganglion and lithocyst or ctenocyst.

The Otenophora are divided by some into four orders, Lobata, Tentaculata, Nematata, and Eurytomata; by others directly into a number of families. Such forms as Eurytomata, Centum, Cyrtopne, and Beros are severally characteristic of the main divisions. Also called Ctenophora.

Otenophoral (te-nōf'-ō-rā), a. [As Otenophor + -al.] Comb-bearing: applied to the parts or system of organs of the Otenophorans which bear the fringes.

Otenophoran (te-nōf'-ō-rā), a. and n. [< Otenophora + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Otenophora; having the characters of the Otenophora; Otenophorous.

II. n. One of the Otenophora.

An Actinia with only eight mesenteries, and these exceedingly thick, whereby the intermesenteric chambers would be reduced to canals; with two aboral pores instead of the one pore which exists in Ceranthus; and with eight bands of cilia corresponding with the reduced intermesenteric chambers, would have all the essential peculiarities of a Otenophoran.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 164.

Otenophore (ten-ō-fōr), n. [NL. Otenophorus: see Otenophor.] 1. One of the eight fringed or ciliated comb-bearing locomotive organs peculiar to the Otenophora.—2. A member of the class Otenophora; a Otenophoran.

Otenophoric (ten-ō-fōr'-ik), a. [As Otenophor + -ic.] Same as Otenophorous.

Otenophorous (te-nōf'-ō-rus), a. [As Otenophor + -ous.] Pertaining to or resembling the Otenophora.

Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 428.

Otenophyllum (ten-ō-fil'-um), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A genus of fossil plants, named by Schimper in allusion to the comb-like appearance of the leaflets on the frond. It belongs to the cycads, and occurs in rocks of Liassic and Jurassic age in various parts of Europe. The genus Otenophyllum as instituted by Schimper includes various forms previously referred by authors to Pterophyllum, Pterocarpites, and Zamia.

Otenopyschilus (ten-ōp-tik'-i-us), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + πύχσις, a fold.] A genus of fossil selachians of the Devonian and Carboniferous periods, containing sharks now referred to the family Petalodontidae, but formerly to Cestracodontidae.

Otenostomata (ten-ō-stō-mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + ὄστρον (ōstro-n), mouth.] A division of gymnoleptans polyzoans having the cell-opening closed by marginal setae, and no vibracula nor avicularia. It is represented by the families Vesiculariidae and Alcyonidiidae.

Otenostomatous (ten-ō-stō-mā-tus), a. [< Otenostomata + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Otenostomata: as, a Otenostomatous polyzoan. Also Otenostomatus.

Otenucha (te-nū'-kū), n. [NL. (Kirby, 1857), < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + τέχνη, have.] A genus of moths, of the family Lithosiidae, having 8-jointed palpi, longer than the head, with the first and second equal and the third shorter. It is distinctively a new-world genus, and the species are found in North and South America.

Othalamidae (tha-lam'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Othalamus + -idae.] A family of thoracic cirripedes.

Othalamus (thal'-a-mus), n. [NL., an irreg. form, perhaps a transposition of Othlamalus, < Gr. ὄθραλος, near the ground, low, akin to χαῖμα, on the ground: see chamoleon, etc.] The typical genus of the family Othalamidae.

Ou. The chemical symbol of copper (Latin cuprum).

Tucu-tucu (Ctenomys brasiliensis).

coarse or uncouth boy or girl: in contempt or reproach.

O, thou dissembling cub! what wilt thou be When time hath sowed a grain on thy case?

Shak., T. H., v. 1.

Hence—34. An assistant to a physician or surgeon in a hospital. [London, Eng.]

At St. Thomas's Hospital, anno 1703, the grand committee resolved "that no surgeon should have more than three Cubs."

cub<sup>1</sup> (kub), v.; pret. and pp. cubbed, ppr. cubbing. [cub<sup>1</sup>, n.] I. trans. To bring forth, as a cub or cubs.

II. intrans. Contemptuously, to bring forth young, as a woman.—To cub it, to live as or act the part of a cub. [Rare.]

Long before Romulus cubbed it with wolves, and Remus scorned earth-works. T. Witherop, Cecil Dremee, iv.

cub<sup>2</sup> (kub), n. [E. dial., prob. a var. (the more orig. form) of cub in the general sense of 'roundish lump': see cub, and cf. cub<sup>3</sup>, which is in part a var. of cub<sup>2</sup>. Cf. cub<sup>3</sup>.] A lump; a heap; a confused mass. [Prov. Eng.]

cub<sup>3</sup> (kub), n. [To be considered with the dim. cubby<sup>3</sup>, q. v.; prob. of I.G. origin; cf. I.G. kubje (dim.), > E. cubby), to-kubje, also kübbung, a shed or lean-to for cattle; bekubbelt, narrow, contracted, crowded for room; cf. also D. kub, kubbe, a fish-trap, which suggests a connection with cubby<sup>2</sup>, a creel. In the sense of 'cupboard,' cub may be an abbr. of the old form cubbord.] 1. A stall for cattle; a crib.

I would rather have such in cub or kennel than in my closet or at my table. Landor.

2. A chest; a bin.

When the ore (in copper-smelting) is sufficiently calcined, it is let down into the cubs or vaults beneath. Kneyc. Brit., VI. 348.

3. A cupboard.

The great ledger-book of the statutes is to be placed in archivis among the university charters, and not in any cub of the library.

Abp. Laud, Chancellorship at Oxford, p. 182.

[Local or obsolete in all uses.]

cub<sup>4</sup> (kub), v. t. [See cub<sup>3</sup>, n.] To shut up or confine.

To be cubbed up on a sudden, how shall he be perplexed, what shall become of him? Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 211.

Art thou of Bethlehem's noble college free,
Stark staring mad, that thou wouldst tempt the sea,
Cub'd in a cabin? Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires, v.

cubage (kü'bä), n. [cube + -age.] 1. The act or process of determining the cubic contents of something; cubature.

The next chapter on the cubage of the cranial cavity Nature, XXXIII. 4.

2. The cubic contents measured.

Cuba (kü'ban), a. and n. [Cuba + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Cuba, a large island of the West Indies belonging to Spain.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Cuba. —2. [l. c.] Same as cubanite.

cubangle (kü'ang'gl), n. [L. cubus, cube, + angulus, angle.] The solid angle formed by three lines meeting at right angles to one another, as in a corner of a cube.

cubanite (kü'ban-ite), n. [(cuban + -ite).] A sulphid of copper and iron, of a bronze-yellow color, intermediate between pyrite and chalcoppyrite, first found in Cuba. Also called cuban.

cubation<sup>1</sup> (kü-bä'shon), n. [L. cubatio (n.), < cubare, lie down.] The act of lying down; a reclining. Ash.

cubator<sup>1</sup> (kü'bä-tör), a. and n. [*ML. *cubatorius* (neut. cubatorium, n., bedstead, bedroom), < L. cubator, one who lies down, < L. cubare, lie down.] I. a. Lying down; reclining; recumbent.

II. n. A place for lying down; a bedroom; a dormitory. Bailey.

cubature (kü'bä-tür), n. [*NL. as if *cubatura*, < L. cubus, cube.] 1. The act or process of finding the solid or cubic contents of a body; cubage.

Hitherto anthropologists have chiefly employed solid particles, such as shot or beads, in the cubature of skulls. Science, V. 409.

2. The cubic contents thus found.

cubboard, n. An obsolete spelling of cupboard.

cubbridge-head (kü'brij-hed), n. [cubbridge, perhaps for cubdordage < cubbord for cupboard + -age, + head.] Naut., a partition made of boards, etc., across the forecabin and half-deck of a ship.

cubby<sup>1</sup> (kü'bī), n.; pl. cubbies (-ies). [Usually in comp. cubbyhole; prob. of I.G. origin; <

cubby<sup>3</sup> (kü'bī), n.; pl. cubbies (-ies). [See cub<sup>3</sup>.] A creel or basket of straw carried on the back and fastened by a strap across the chest; used in the Orkney and Shetland islands.

cubbyhole (kü'bī-höl), n. A small, close apartment, or inclosed space; a closet, or any similar confined place; hence, humorously, a very small house; a cot.

One place, a queer little "cubby-hole," has the appearance of having been a Roman Catholic chapel. O. W. Holmes, Our Hundred Days in Europe, iv.

cubby-house (kü'bī-hous), n. A little house, as a doll-house, built by children in play.

We used to build cubby-houses and fix 'em out with broken china and posies. R. T. Cooke, Somebody's Neighbors, p. 6.

cubby-yew (kü'bī-yū), n. [A corruption of cubia.] Same as crab-eater, 2.

cub-drawn (kü'bī-dran), a. Drawn or sucked by cubs; exhausted by sucking; hence, fiercely hungry. [Rare.]

This night, wherein the cub-drawn bear would couch,
The lion and the belly-pinched wolf
Keep their fur dry, unbattered he runs,
And hids what will take all. Shak., Lear, III. 1.

cube (küb), n. [L. cube = Sp. Pg. It. cubo = G. Dan. kubus, Dan. also kube = Sw. kub, < L. cubus, < Gr. kybos, a die, a cube, a cubic number.] 1. In geom., a regular body with six square faces; a rectangular parallelepiped, having all its edges equal. The cube is used as the measuring unit of solid content, as the square is of superficial content or area. (Cubes of different sides are to one another as the third power of the number of units in one of their sides.)

2. In arith. and alg., the product obtained by multiplying the square of a quantity by the quantity itself; the third power of a quantity: as,  $4 \times 4 \times 4 = 64$ , the cube of 4;  $a^3$  is the cube of  $a$ , or  $a^3$  of  $a$ .—Cube root, the number or quantity of which a given number or quantity is the cube. The easiest way of extracting a cube root is by Horner's method. See method.—Cyclical cube. See cyclical.—Duplication of the cube. See duplication.—Leullie's cube, a cubical vessel filled with hot water and used, under varying conditions, in measuring the reflecting, radiating, and absorbing powers of different substances.—Truncated cube, a tetracene-decahedron (or fourteen sided body), formed by cutting off the faces of the cube parallel to those of the coaxial octahedron far enough to leave them regular octagons, while adding eight triangular faces. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids.

cube (küb), v. t.; pret. and pp. cubed, ppr. cubing. [Cf. cube, n.] To raise to the cube or third power. See cube, n., 2.

cubeb (kü'beb), n. [ME. corruptly oucube, gubibe; = F. cubbe = Pr. Sp. cubeba = Pg. cubebas, cobebas, pl., = It. cubeb, < ML. cubeba, < Ar. Pers. kabāba, Hind. kabāba, kabāb-chāni.] The small spicy berry of the Piper Cubeba, a climbing shrub of Java and other East Indian islands. It resembles a grain of pepper, but is somewhat longer. In Cubeb (Piper Cubeba).

aromatic warmth and pungency cubeba are far inferior to pepper; but they are much valued for their use in diseases of the urinary system and of the bronchial tubes. Sometimes called cubeb pepper.—African cubeba, the fruit of Piper Clusii, which has the hot taste and odor of black pepper, without the peculiar medicinal properties of East Indian cubeba.

cubebic (kü'beb'ik), a. [Cf. cubeb + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from cubeba.—Cubebic acid,  $C_{12}H_{10}O_4$ , an amorphous yellow substance contained in cubeba, to which the diuretic effect of the drug is said to be due.

cubebine (kü'beb'in), n. [Cf. cubeb + -ine.] An odorless substance ( $C_{10}H_{10}O_3$ ) crystallizing in small needles or scales, found in cubeba. Physiologically it seems to be inactive.

cube-ore (kü'b'ör), n. A mineral crystallizing in cube crystals of a greenish color; a hydrous arseniate of iron. Also called pharmacosiderite.

cube-powder (kü'b'pou'dér), n. Gunpowder made in large cubical grains, and burning more slowly than small or irregular grains, used in heavy ordnance. It is made by cutting press-cake in two directions at right angles to each other, so as to produce cubes with edges 0.75 inch in length. There are about 72 grains to the pound. Also called cubical powder.

cube-spar (kü'b'spär), n. Anhydrous sulphate of calcium; anhydrite.

cubhood (kü'b'hüd), n. [Cf. cub<sup>1</sup> + -hood.] The character or condition of a cub; the state of being a cub.

The shaping of the earth from the nebulous cubhood of its youth . . . to its present form. Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 243.

cube (kü'bik), a. and n. [= F. cubique = Sp. cubico = Pg. It. cubico, < L. cubicus, < Gr. kubi-nos, < kubos, a die, cube; see cubo.] I. a. 1. Having the form of a cube.—2. Solid; three-dimensional: said of a unit of volume related to a unit of length of the same name as a cube is related to its edge. Thus, a cubic yard is the volume or solid contents of a cube whose edges are each a yard long. Abbreviated c.

3. In alg. and geom., being of the third order, degree, or power.—Cubic alum. See alum.—Cubic curve. See curve.—Cubic or cubical determinant. See determinant.—Cubic ellipsoid, a curve whose equation is  $ax^3 = x^2(b - z)$ . It is a cuspidal cubic tangent to the line at infinity.—Cubic equation, in alg., an equation in which the highest power of the unknown quantity is a cube.—Cubic number, cubic quantity. Same as cube, 2.

Cubic surface, a surface whose point-equation is of the third degree; a surface cut by every line in space in three points, real or imaginary.—Cubic system, in crystal, same as isometric system. See crystallography.—Plane cubic parabola, a cubic of the form  $ax^3 = y^2$ . It is a cubic of the third class, having a cusp at infinity and a single point of inflection (which is a center).—Twisted cubic curve. See twisted cubic, below.

II. n. In math., a cubical quantity, equation, or curve.—Binary, ternary, quaternary cubic, a homogeneous entire function of the third degree, containing two, three, or four variables.—Characteristic of a cubic. See characteristic.—Circular cubic, cuspidal cubic. See the adjectives.—Twisted cubic, a curve in space which is cut by every plane in three points, real or imaginary.

cubica (kü'bi-kä), n. [Origin uncertain.] A fine kind of shalloon used for linings, ranging in width from 32 to 36 inches. Dict. of Needlework.

cubical (kü'bi-käl), a. 1. Of or pertaining to a cube.—2. Cubic.—Cubical coefficient of expansion. See coefficient.—Cubical ellipsoid, hyperbola, hyperbolic parabola, parabola, twisted cubics distinguished by their intersections with the plane at infinity; the ellipse having only one real intersection, the hyperbola three, all distinct, the hyperbolic parabola three, of which two fall together, and the parabola three, all coincident.—Cubical figure, a figure in three dimensions.—Cubical powder. Same as cube powder.

cubically (kü'bi-käl-i), adv. In a cubic manner; by cubing; with reference to the cube or its properties.

Sixty-four . . . made by multiplying . . . four cubically. Dr. H. Murr., Conjectura Cabbalistica, p. 217.

cubicalness (kü'bi-käl-nes), n. The character of being cubical.

cubicite, cubisite (kü'bi-äit, -zīt), n. [Cf. cubic + (ceol)ite, or (cubi)ite + (aeol)ite.] Cubic zeolite, or analcime.

cubiclet (kü'bi-kl), n. [Also cubicule; < L. cubiculum, a bedroom, < cubare, lie down.] A bedroom; a chamber. [Rare.]

Two messengers from the flock of cardinals, invading the sanctity of his (Pole's) nightly cubicule, broke his slumbers with the news of his proffered designation. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xvii cubicone (kü'bi-kön), n. [Cf. cubic + cone.] A conical surface of the third degree.

cubicontravariant (kü'bi-kon-trä-vä'ri-ant), n. [Cf. cubic + contravariant.] A contravariant of the third degree.

cubicovariant (kü'bi-kö-vä'ri-ant), n. [Cf. cubic + covariant.] A covariant of the third degree.

cubicritoid (kü'bi-krit'i-koid), n. [Cf. cubic + critoid.] A critoid of the third degree.

cubacula, n. Plural of cubiculum.

cubicular (kū-bik'ū-lār), a. [L. cubicularis, also cubicularium; see cubicular.] Belonging to a bedchamber; private.

The three Rules and Rubrics in our Liturgy sufficient to guide every one in the performance of all holy duties, yet I believe every one hath some mode and model or formula of his own, especially for his private cubicular devotion.

Hosell, Letters, I v. 32.

cubicular (kū-bik'ū-lā-ri), a. and n. [ME. cubicular, n.; = OF. cubicularis = Pr. cubiculari = Sp. Pg. cubiculario = It. cubiculario, < L. cubicularius, of or pertaining to a bedchamber, as a noun a chamber-servant, valet-de-chambre, < cubiculum, a bedchamber; see cubicl.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a bedchamber. — 2. Fitted for the posture of lying down. [Rare.]

Custom, by degrees, changed their cubicular beds into dischibitory.

St. T. Brown, Vulg. Err., v. 6.

II. n. A chamberlain. [Wyclif.]

cubicle (kū-bi-kūl), n. [See cubicl.] Same as cubicl.

cubiculot (kū-bik'ū-lō), n. [For It. cubicolo, < L. cubiculum; see cubicl.] A bedchamber; a chamber.

St. And. Where shall I find you?

St. T. We'll call thee at the cubiculo.

Shak., T. N., III. 2.

cubiculum (kū-bik'ū-lum), n.; pl. cubicula (-lā). [ML., < L. cubiculum, a bedchamber; see cubicl.] 1. In archeol., a burial-chamber having round its walls loculi or compartments for the reception of the dead. See catcomb. — 2. A mortuary chapel attached to a church.

cubiform (kū-bi-form), a. [L. cubus, cube, + forma, shape.] Having the form of a cube; cubical.

The genus Amphitetras . . . is chiefly characterized by the cubiform shape of its frustules.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 238.

cubivariant (kū-bi-vā-ri-ant), n. [L. cubit + variant.] In math., an invariant of the third degree in the coefficients of a quantic.

cubit (kū-bit), n. [ME. cubit, cubito = OF. coude, coute, cuto, F. coude = Pr. coude, code, elbow, = Obsp. oobdo, Sp. codo, elbow, a measure, cubito, the ulna, = Sp. cubito, the ulna, a measure, covado, an ell (cf. coto, a small piece), = It. cubito, cubit, elbow, angle, = Wall. cot, < L. cubitum, rarely cubitus, the elbow, the distance from the elbow to the end of the middle finger, an ell, earlier in Gr. κύβιτος, also κύβιττος, described as Sicilian (the Attic word being ὠλεκράνον or ὠλέων = L. ulna = E. ell), prob. from ὠλε, lit. a bending, < cubere (bend), recline, lie, = Gr. κύνειν, bend; cf. Gael. cubach, bent.] 1. In anat.: (a) The forearm or antibrachium; the arm from the elbow to the wrist.

Putte thou elde clothes . . . vnder the cubit of thin honds [translation of Latin sub cubito].

Wyclif, Jer. xxxviii. 12 (Purv.).

(b) The inner bone of the forearm; the ulna. — 2. A linear unit derived from the length of the forearm. The natural cubit used for measuring cloth was probably originally the length from the end of the thumb-nail to the elbow, though no cubit so short is known. The royal Egyptian cubit is, of all units of measure or weight, that one whose use can be traced back in history the furthest; for it was employed in the construction of the pyramids of Gizeh, perhaps 3600 n. C. From a number of Egyptian measuring-sticks found in the tombs, this cubit is ascertained to be equal to 50.64 English inches, or 524 millimeters. It was divided into seven palms, instead of six as the ordinary cubit was, and this was probably owing to measurement along walls with the forearm having been made by placing the hand behind the elbow and leaving it on the wall until the arm was laid down again. The Egyptian and Roman are the only ancient cubits of importance whose lengths are undisputed. The Roman cubit was 14 Roman feet, or 17.4 English inches. Two cubits are mentioned in the Bible, for Ezekiel speaks of a cubit which is a cubit and a hand-breadth. The shorter of these cubits was probably that which in Deuteronomy is called the cubit of a man; the longer one, that which in Chronicles is called the cubit after the first measure — that is, the most ancient cubit. Julian of Ascalon speaks of two cubits in the ratio of 23 to 25. But we have no accurate knowledge of the lengths of the Hebrew cubits, since the cubit of the temple is estimated variously by high authorities, as from 19 to 26 inches. There are many cubits, ancient and modern, of widely different values.

And see schulle understonde, that the 'ros of oure Lord was eyght Cubytes long, and the overthwart piece was of lengthe thre Cubytes and an half.

Manderille, Travels, p. 12.

Four cubites [was] the breadth of it [Og's iron bedstead], after the cubit of a man.

Deut. iii. 11.

3. In entom., one of the veins, nerves, or ribs of an insect's wing; a cubital rib, succeeding the radius or sector. See phrases under cubitus. cubital (kū-bi-tal), a. [L. cubitalis, < cubitus, elbow; see cubit.] 1. In anat., pertaining to the forearm, or to the ulna; antibrachial; ulnar. — 2. In entom., pertaining to the cubit or cubitus of an insect's wing: as, cubital cells; the cubital rib. — 3. Of the length or measure of a cubit.

Cubital stature. Sir T. Brown, Vulg. Err., iv. 11.

4. Growing on the cubit, antibrachium, or forearm, as feathers of a bird's wing: as, the cubital coverts. See covert, n., 6.

The principal modes of imbrication of the cubital coverts, as observed in healthy living birds of all the leading carinate forms.

Nature, XXXIII. 631.

cubital (kū-bi-tal), n. [L. cubital, an elbow, cushion, < cubitus, elbow; see cubit, and cubital, a.] 1. A bolster or cushion to rest the elbow upon, as used by persons reclining at meals in Roman antiquity, and by invalids, etc. — 2. [Cubital, a.] The third joint of the pedipalp of a spider. It is generally short.

cubit-bone (kū-bit-bōn), n. The cubital bone; the ulna.

cubited (kū-bi-ted), a. [Cubit + -ed.] Having the measure of a cubit: used in composition. [Rare.]

cubit-fashion (kū-bit-fash'ōn), adv. In the mode of measuring with the forearm, on which the cubit is founded.

The olchins was roughly spoken of as equal to the Russian arshine, and measured cubit-fashion, from the elbow to the end of the forefinger.

Lavinski, Russian Central Asia, II. 36.

cubiti, n. Plural of cubitus.

cubitidigital (kū-bi-ti-dij'i-tal), a. [L. cubitum, elbow, + digitus, finger, + -al.] In anat., of or pertaining to the forearm and to the fingers.

cubitiere (F. pron. kū-bi-ti-ère), n. [F., < L. cubitum, elbow; see cubit.] In medieval armor, a general name for the defense of the elbow when forming a piece separate from the covering of the arm. In the thirteenth century it consisted of a round, slightly hollowed in the form of a cup, and held over the handker or bruique by a strap passing round the elbow-joint; later it became more conical, and in the fourteenth century another plate was added, covering the side of the elbow-joint. When the complete brass-armor was introduced, toward the close of the fourteenth century, the cubitiere formed a part of this, and was regularly articulated; but the old cup-shaped form or some modification of it was retained by those who could not afford the expense of the brass-armor of plate. See cups under armor.

cubitocarpal (kū-bi-tō-kār'pal), a. [L. cubitum, elbow, + NL. carpus, q. v., + -al.] In anat., pertaining to the cubit or forearm and to the carpus or wrist: as, the cubitocarpal articulation. In man this joint is called radio-carpal.

cubitus (kū-bi-tus), n.; pl. cubiti (-ti). [L.: see cubit.] Same as cubit. — Cubitus anticus, in entom., the anterior cubital or discoidal rib. — Cubitus posticus, in entom., the posterior cubital or submedian rib. Claus. cubiti, n. See cubicl.

cubla (kū-bā), n. [NL., perhaps of South African origin.] A book-name of a South African shrike, the Dryocopus cubla. Also cubla-shrike.

cubo-biquadratic (kū-bō-bi-kwōd-rat'ik), a. In math., of the seventh degree.

cuboctahedral (kū-bō-ok-tā-hē'dral), a. [C. cuboctahedron + -al.] Relating to or having the shape of a cuboctahedron. Also cubo-octahedral.

cuboctahedron (kū-bō-ok-tā-hē'dron), n. [C. cube + octahedron.] A solid with fourteen faces formed by cutting off the corners of a cube parallel to the coaxial octahedron far enough to leave the original faces squares, while adding eight triangular faces at the truncations. The same result is obtained by cutting off the corners of the octahedron far enough to leave the original faces triangles. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids. Also cubo-octahedron. — Truncated cuboctahedron, a solid with twenty-six sides formed by the faces of the coaxial cube, octahedron, and rhombic dodecahedron, in such proportions that the faces belonging to the cube become regular octagons, those belonging to the octahedron hexagons, and those belonging to the dodecahedron squares. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids.

cubo-cube (kū-bō-kūb), n. [NL. cubocubus, < LGr. κύβωκύβος, the product of two cubo numbers, < Gr. κύβος, cube, + κύβος, cube.] In math., the sixth power of a number; the square of the cube: thus, 64 is the cubo-cube of 2.

cubocubic (kū-bō-kūb'ik), a. In math., of the sixth degree. — Cubocubic root, a sixth root.

cubo-cubo-cube (kū-bō-kū-bō-kūb), n. [NL. cubocubo-cubus, < Gr. κύβος + κύβος + κύβος, cube.] In math., the ninth power of a number; the cube of the cube: thus, 512 is the cubo-cubo-cube of 2.

cubo-cuneiform (kū-bō-kū-nē-i-fōrm), a. [C. cubo (id.) + cuneiform.] In anat., pertaining to the cuboid and to the cuneiform bones: as, a cubo-cuneiform articulation or ligament.

cubo-dodecahedral (kū-bō-dō-dek-a-hē'dral), a. [L. cubus, cube, + dodecahedral.] Presenting the two forms, a cube and a dodecahedron. cuboid (kū'boid), a. and n. [Gr. κύβοειδής, cube-shaped, < κύβος, cube, + είδος, form.] 1. a. Resembling a cube in form.

II. n. In anat., the outermost bone of the distal row of tarsal bones, or bones of the instep, supporting the heads of the fourth and fifth metatarsal bones: so called from its cubic form in man. It is regarded as consisting of or as representing the fourth and fifth distal tarsal bones of the typical tarsus. See cot under foot.

cuboidal (kū-boi'dal), a. [C. cuboid + -al.] Same as cuboid.

True cork is destitute of intercellular spaces, its cells being of regular shape (generally cuboidal) and fitted closely to each other.

Bessey, Botany, p. 128.

cuboides (kū-boi'dēs), n. [NL., < Gr. κύβοειδής, cuboid; see cuboid.] In anat., the cuboid bone; the cuboid.

cubolite (kū-bō-lit), n. [L. cubus, a cube, + -ite: so called because it sometimes occurs in cubic crystals.] Same as analcite.

cubomancy (kū-bō-man-si), n. [Gr. κύβορ, a cube, die, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination by means of dice; dice-throwing.

Cubomedusae (kū-bō-mē-dū'sē), n. pl. [NL., < L. cubus, a cube, + NL. Medusae, q. v.] A family of acraspid medusans or jelly-fishes, having a somewhat cubical figure in consequence of the arrangement of principal parts in fours. Thus, there are four periradial marginal bodies, containing endodermal ocytots, acoustic clubs, and one or more eyes; four wide square periradial pouches of the gastral cavity; and four pairs of leaf-shaped gonads, developed from the subumbrellar endoderm of the gastral pouches, fixed by their margins to the four interradial septa and freely projecting into the gastral cavity. Preferably written Cubomedusae, as a family name.

cubomedusan (kū-bō-mē-dū'san), a. and n. I. a. Having the cuboid character of the Cubomedusae; of or pertaining to these scaphopods.

II. n. A jelly-fish of the family Cubomedusae.

cubo-octahedral (kū-bō-ok-tā-hē'dral), a. [C. cubo-octahedron + -al.] Same as cuboctahedral.

cubo-octahedron (kū-bō-ok-tā-hē'dron), n. [L. cubus, cube, + NL. octahedron, q. v.] Same as cuboctahedron.

Cubostomus (kū-bōs'tō-mēs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύβος, cube, + στόμα, mouth.] A suborder of Discomedusae having the parts in sets of four or eight, and the mouth simple, at the end of a rudimentary manubrium, and without any processes. It is represented by such forms as Nausithoe. Preferably written Cubostomata.

cubostomous (kū-bōs'tō-mus), a. [C. Cubostoma + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cubostoma.

cuca (kū-kā), n. A variant form of coca.

The pretious leaf called cuca.

De La Vega.

cucaine (kū-kā-in), n. [C. cuca + -ine.] A variant form of cocaine.

cuchia (kū'chi-ē), n. [NL.; from native name.] A fish, Amphiprion cuchia, found lurking in holes in the marshes of Bengal, of a sluggish and torpid nature, and remarkable for tenacity of life. See Amphiprion.

cuck, v. t. [*ME. *cucken*, **cukken*, **coken*; recorded only in the verbal n. cucking, and in comp. cucking-stool, cuck-stool, q. v.; prob. < leel. kuka, equiv. to E. cack: see cack.] To ease one's self at stool.

cuck, v. t. [Inferred from cucking-stool, after the assumed analogy of duck as related to ducking-stool.] To put in the cucking-stool.

Follow the law: and you can cuck me, spare not.

Middleton and Dekker, Boaring Girl, v. 2.

cuck, v. t. [A var. of cook.] To call, as the cuckoo.

[Cucking of moor fowls, cucking of cuckoos, bunnibing of bees.

Urguhart, tr. of Rabelais, III. 12.

cuck (kuk), v. t. [E. dial., also cock; origin obscure.] To cast; throw; chuck. [North. Eng.]

Cook me the ball!

Grass.

cucking-stool (kuk'ing-stōl), n. [ME. cucking-stool, cuckynge, cooking-stole, etc.; cf. equiv. cuck-stool, < ME. cuckestole, kukstole, cockstole, etc., orig. in the form of a close-stool (in the earliest mention called oathedra stercoria); < cucking, verbal n. of cuck, v., + stool.] Formerly, a chair in which an offender, as a common brawler or sould, or a woman of disorderly life, or a defaulting brewer or baker, was placed, to be hooted at or pelted by the mob. The cuckling stool has been frequently confounded with the ducking stool, but the former did not of itself admit of the ducking of its occupant, although in conjunction with the tumbrel it was sometimes used for that purpose.

I had been tried to silence,
I should have been worthy the cuckling stool ere this time

A similar imitation occurs also in coo, cook, cock, oak, etc. (see these words) The forms, being imitative, do not conform closely to the rules of historical development. In early superstitions the cuckoo was regarded as of evil omen, and enters into various imprecations and proverbs as an embodiment of the devil. It was also a term of reproach or contempt equivalent to fool (cf. gock, in similar use), and with reference to its habit of laying its eggs in other birds' nests is the subject of endless allusion in early literature see cuckold<sup>1</sup> 1 A bird of the family Cuculidae, and especially of the subfamily Cuculina or genus Cuculus so called from its characteristic note. bill and ashly plumage varied with black and white. It is notorious for its parasitism, having the habit common to many birds of the family of depositing its eggs in the nests of other birds is chiefly smaller than itself and causing its young to be reared by the foster parents — a condition generally entailing the destruction of their own progeny. The remarkable cries which have given the bird its imitative names in many languages are the love notes uttered only during the mating season. The species of cuckoo are very numerous and are found in most parts of the world they are not all parasitic. There are several subfamilies of Cuculidae and many genera. (See Cuculidae) The American tree cuckoo are arboreal not parasitic and are confined to America. they are also called hook-bills. Cuckoo a term not of special pertinence. The ground cuckoo are American birds of terrestrial habits. The cuckoo cuckoo are old world forms as are also the cuckoo lark lark or spur-billed cuckoo also called the pheasant cuckoo.

Cucujidae (ku-ku'p-de), n pl [NL < Cucujus + -idae] A family of clavicorn Coleoptera or beetles.

The dorsal segments of the abdomen are partly membranous ventral segments are thick the tarsus are jointed the antennae are moderate in size the palpi are approximate at the base the anterior coxae are rounded or oval and not prominent the posterior coxae are not approximate and are separated the ventral segments are subequal the middle coxal cavities open externally. The Cucujidae are mostly small dark colored beetles living under bark or in decaying wood some however infest food stuffs especially those of a farinaceous character. The family has been divided into Presacarina, Cucujina, Hemipresacarina, Brentina and Sylvestrina.

Cucujus (ku'kú-jus), n [NL; of S Amer. origin.] The typical genus of the family Cucujidae, having the first tarsal joints very short.

C. olivaceus is a characteristic example. It is scarlet above with finely punctured surface; the eyes and antennae are black.

Cuculi (kū-kū-lī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. cuculus, a cuckoo; see cuckoo and Cuculus.] A superfamily of coecygomorphic birds, of the conventional order Picaria, including several families related to the Cuculidae.

Cuculidae (kū-kū-lī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cuculus + -idae.] A family of yoke-toed picarian birds, typical of the group Coecygomorpha or Cuculiformes; the cuckoos. The feet are permanently syndactyl by reversion of the fourth toe, yet the birds are not of scanorial habits. The bill is moderate, generally curved, with a deflected tip and no cere; the palate is demognathous; the legs are homologous; the carotids are two in number; the oil gland is nude; and oesca are present. It is a large and important family, with about 300 species, showing various minor modifications of structure corresponding in a measure with faunal areas; it is consequently divided into a number of subfamilies. The Coccyzinae are a peculiar Madagascarian type. The Phoenicophaninae are confined to the old world, as are the Crotophaginae or spout-heaved cuckoos, and the Cuculinae or typical cuckoos. (See cut under cuckoo.) America has three types, those of the Coccyzinae or tree-cuckoos, the Saururharinae or ground-cuckoos, and the Crotophaginae or gregarious cuckoos. (See cut under ant, Coccyzus, and chaperon-cut.) The birds of the genus Indicator, sometimes included in the family, are now usually elevated to the rank of a distinct family. In their economy the Cuculidae are noted for their parasitism, which runs through many, though not all, of the genera composing the family.

Cuculiform (kū-kū-lī-fōrm), a. [NL. cuculiformis, < L. cuculus, a cuckoo, + forma, shape.] Cuculine; cuckoo-like in form or structure; coecygomorphic.

Cuculiformes (kū-kū-lī-fōrm' mēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of cuculiformis; see cuculiform.] A superfamily of cuculiform picarian birds, approximately equivalent to Coecygomorpha, separating the cuculine or cuckoo-like birds on the one hand from the Cypseliformes, and on the other from the Piciformes. It contains the whole of the conventional order Picaria, excepting the goatsuckers, swifts, and hummingbirds, and the woodpeckers and wrynecks.

Cuculines (kū-kū-lī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cuculus + -inae.] 1. In ornith.: (a) A subfamily of Cuculidae, including the typical cuckoos, such as the Cuculus canorus of Europe. See cut under cuckoo. (b) In Nitzsch's system of classification, a major and miscellaneous group of picarian or cuculiform birds of no fixed limits, including, besides cuckoos, the trogons, goatsuckers, and sundry others. [Not in use in this sense.]—2. In entom., a well-marked group of naked, sometimes wasp-like, parasitic bees, having no polleniferous brushes or plates; the cuckoo-bees. See cuckoo-bee.

Cuculines (kū-kū-lī-nē), a. [NL. cuculinus, < L. cuculus, a cuckoo; see cuckoo, and cf. cuculinae.] Cuckoo-like; cuculiform; coecygomorphic; pertaining or related to the cuckoos.

Cuculosa (kū-kū-lē-ā), n. [NL., < L. cucullus, a cap, hood; see cowl.] A genus of asiphonate bivalves, of the family Arctica, or ark-shells, having a somewhat square gibbous shell with hinge-teeth oblique at the middle and parallel with the hinge at the ends. The species are chiefly fossil.

Cucullaris (kū-kū-lā-riā), n.; pl. cucullares (-rēz). [NL., < L. cucullus, a cap, hood; see cowl.] The cowl-muscle or trapezius of man: so called because, taken with its fellow of the opposite side, it has been likened to a monk's hood or cowl. See trapezius.

Cucullate, cucullated (kū-kū-lāt, -ā-ted), a. [LL. cucullatus, < L. cucullus, a cap, hood; see cowl.] 1. Hooded; cowlled; covered as with a hood.—2. In bot., having the shape or semblance of a hood; wide at the top and drawn to a point below, in the shape of a cornet of paper; like or likened to a hood; as, a cucullate leaf or nestary. In mosses it is specifically applied to a conical calyptra cleft at one side.—3. In zoöl., hooded; having the head shaped, marked, or colored as if hooded or cowlled; specifically applied, in entom., to the prothorax of an insect when it is elevated or otherwise shaped into a kind of hood or cowl for the head.

They (the cicadas and the grasshopper) are differently cucullated or capuched upon the head and back.

Sir T. Brown, Vulg. Err., v. 3.

Cucullately (kū-kū-lāt-lī), adv. In a cucullate manner; in the shape or with the appearance of a hood.

Cuculiform (kū-kū-lī-fōrm), a. [NL. cucullus, a cap, hood (see cowl), + forma, shape.] Resembling a hood or cowl in form or appearance; cucullate.

Cuculites (kū-kū-līt), n. [NL. cuculites (Schroter, 1764, in form cuculites), < L. cucullus, a cowl; see cucullus.] A name formerly given to fossil species of cones or cone-like shells.

Cucullus (kū-kū-lū), n. [L., a cowl; see cowl.] 1. A cowl or monk's hood; as in the proverb Cucullus non facit monachum (the cowl does not make the monk). See hood.—2. [NL.] In zoöl. and anat., a formation or coloration of the head like or likened to a hood.

Cuculoides (kū-kū-lōi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cuculus + -oides.] The Cuculidae and Muscophaginae, or cuckoos and touracoos, combined to constitute a superfamily.

Cuculoides (kū-kū-lōi-dēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. cuculus, cuckoo, + Gr. idēs, form.] In Blyth's system (1849), a superfamily of his Zygodactyl, in which the Leptosomatidae and Bucconidae are united with the Cuculidae proper.

Cuculus (kū-kū-lū), n. [NL., < L. cuculus, a cuckoo; see cuckoo.] The typical genus of the family Cuculidae, formerly more comprehensive than the family as at present constituted, but now restricted to forms congeneric with Cuculus canorus, the type of the genus. See cut under cuckoo.

Cucumber (kū-kūm-bōr), n. [E. dial. cowcumber, formerly in good literary use, being the proper mod. representative of the ME. form (cucumber, being a reversion to the L. form); < ME. cucumbar, cucumer, cocumber = OF. cocombre, F. cocombre = Pr. cogombre = Sp. cuhombro = It. cocomero, < ML. cucumer, L. cucumis (cucumer), a cucumber.] 1. A common running garden-plant, (Cucumis sativus). It is a native of southern Asia, but has been cultivated from the earliest times in all civilized countries. See Cucumis.

This seedling with cucumber roots ground and eaten, and save of every myse (misshap) that are.

Palladius, Illyriodromia (E. E. T. S.), p. 38.

2. The long, fleshy fruit of this plant, eaten as a cooling salad when green, and also used for pickling. (See gherkin.) The stem-end is usually very bitter, as is the whole fruit in some uncultivated varieties.

We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons. Num. xl. 6.

3. A common name of various plants of other genera.—Bitter cucumber, the colocynth, Citrullus Colocynthis.—Cool as a cucumber, very cool; figuratively, collected; entirely self-possessed.

When the wife of the great Socrates threw a . . . soap at his cruthe head he was as cool as a cucumber.

Colman the Younger, Heir-at-Law.

Creeping cucumber, Melothria pendula, a delicate low cucurbitaceous climber of the southern United States, bearing oval green berries.—Cucumber-oil, a drying-oil obtained from the seeds of the pumpkin, squash, melon, etc.—Indian cucumber, see cucumber-root.—One-seeded or star cucumber, the common name in the United States of the Sicyopteron angulatus, a climbing cucurbitaceous annual, bearing clusters of dry, ovate, prickly, one-seeded fruits.—Serpent-cucumber, a variety of the common muskmelon with very long fruit.—Snake-cucumber, the Trichosanthes Anguria, a tall cucurbitaceous climber of the East Indies, with ornamental sinuate-petaled flowers and a snake-like fruit, 8 or 4 feet long, turning red when ripe.—Squirting or wild cucumber, the Echium Elaterrum. See Echium. (See also sea-cucumber.)

Cucumber-root (kū-kūm-bēr-rōt), n. A liliaceous plant of the United States, Medeola Virginica, allied to Trillium, having two whorls of leaves on the slender stem, and an umbel of recurved flowers. The tuberous rootstock has the taste of the cucumber, whence the common name of Indian cucumber. It has been used as a remedy for dropsy.

Cucumber-tree (kū-kūm-bēr-trē), n. 1. The common name in the United States for several species of Magnolia, especially M. acuminata and M. cordata, from the shape and size of the fruit. The long-leaved cucumber-tree is M. Fraseri; the large-leaved, M. macrophylla.—2. The bilimbi, Averrhoa Bilimbi, of the East Indies. See Averrhoa.

Cucumiform (kū-kū-mi-fōrm), a. [NL. cucumis, a cucumber, + forma, shape.] Shaped like a cucumber; cylindrical and tapering toward the ends, and either straight or curved.

Cucumis (kū-kū-mis), n. [NL., < L. cucumis, a cucumber; see cucumber.] A genus of plants, natural order Cucurbitaceae, containing about 25 species, natives of warm regions. They are annual or perennial herbs, with hairy stems and leaves, running over the ground or climbing. They have yellow flowers, and a round or roundish, cylindrical, or angular fleshy fruit. The most widely known species are C. sativus, the cucumber, and C. Melo, which yields all the different varieties of the muskmelon. The fruits of some of the species have a very bitter taste and are reputed to be purgative.

Cucupha (kū-kū-fā), n. A sort of coif or cap, with a double bottom inclosing a mixture of aromatic powders, having cotton for an excipient. It was formerly used as a powerful cephalic. Dunghson.

cucurbit, cucurbita (kū-kēr-bit), n. [F. cucurbita, < L. cucurbita, a gourd; see gourd.] 1. A chemical vessel originally shaped like a gourd, but sometimes shallow, with a wide mouth, used in distillation. It may be made of copper, glass, tin, or stoneware. With its head or cover it constitutes the alembic. See alembic.

I have . . . distilled quicksilver in a cucurbita, fitted with a capacious glass-head. Boyle, Colours.

2. A gourd-shaped vessel for holding liquids. Oriental water-jars are often of this form, and porcelain and earthenware vases of China and Japan are frequently so shaped.

3. A cupping-glass. cucurbit (kū-kēr-bit), n. A plant of the natural order Cucurbitaceae.

Cucurbita (kū-kēr-bi-tā), n. [NL., < L. cucurbita, a gourd, whence ult. E. gourd; see gourd.] A genus of plants, natural order Cucurbitaceae. There are about a dozen species, annuals or perennials, inhabiting the warmer regions of the world. They are creeping herbs, with lobed and cordate leaves, large yellow flowers, and fleshy, generally very large, fruits. Nearly all the perennial species are natives of Mexico and the adjacent regions on the north, and have usually large tuberous or fusiform roots. The three annual species originated probably in southern Asia, have long been in cultivation, and have developed many very different forms. It is nearly certain that these species were extensively cultivated in America long before its discovery by Columbus. C. Pepo and its varieties yield the pumpkin, the warty, long-neck, and crookneck squashes and vegetable marrow, and the egg- or orange-gourd. C. maxima yields the various varieties of winter squash, often of great size, the turban-squash, etc. C. moenchii is the source of the musky, China, or Barbary squash.

Cucurbitaceae (kū-kēr-bi-tā-sē), n. pl. [NL., < cucurbita + -aceae.] A natural order of poly-petalous dicotyledonous plants, with the petals more or less united into a monopetalous corolla, and containing climbing or trailing species with unisexual flowers, scabrous stems and leaves, and a more or less pulpy fruit. An acid principle pervades the order; when this principle is greatly diffused the fruits are edible, often delicious, but when concentrated, as in the colocynth and bryony, they are dangerous or actively poisonous. The order includes 80 genera and about 600 species, the most useful genera being Cucumis (the cucumber), Cucurbita (the pumpkin and squash), Citrullus (the watermelon and colocynth), and Lagenaria (the gourd). Species of various other genera yield edible fruits or possess medicinal properties.

cucurbitaceous (kū-kēr-bi-tā-siūs), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cucurbitaceae.

cucurbital (kū-kēr-bi-tal), a. [NL. cucurbita + -al.] Of or pertaining to the genus Cucurbita or the order Cucurbitaceae; as, the cucurbital alliance of Lindley.

cucurbitate, n. See cucurbitif.

Cucurbitates (kū-kēr-bi-tāt), n. pl. [NL., < Cucurbita + -ates.] A tribe of Cucurbitaceae.

cucurbitin (kū-kēr-bi-tin), n. [NL. cucurbita + -in.] A doubtful alkaloid from the seeds of Cucurbita Pepo.

cucurbitinus (kū-kēr-bi-tī-nus), *n.; pl. cucurbitini (-ni). [NL., < L. cucurbitinus, n., like a gourd, < cucurbita, a gourd; see gourd.] A joint or link of a tapeworm; a cestoid sodid; a proglottis.*

cucurbitive (kū-kēr-bi-tiv), a. [NL. cucurbita, a gourd, + -ive.] Shaped like the seeds of a gourd; said specifically of certain worms. Imp. Dict.

cod (kud), n. [*< ME. cude, cude, code, var. guide, quado (> E. quid, q. v.), < AS. cūda, cūda, cūda (def. 1), also in hēit cūda (also hēit cūda, cūda, cūda, gen. cūdas, cūdas), mastie, lit. 'white cod'; usually derived, as 'that which is chewed,' from cūda, E. chew; but the orig. form of the word is cūda (whence the mod. form quid, q. v.), and neither cūda nor cūda can be formed from cūda, Teut.  $\sqrt{*ku, *kū, by any regular process. The word agrees more nearly (though the connection is doubtful) with AS. cūth = OHG. gūth = Icel. kúth = Goth. kúthus, stomach, belly, womb (in AS. only in last sense), prob. = L. cūter = Gr. yūthē = Skt. jathara, belly: see cūter, ventral, etc., gastric, etc.] 1. A portion of food voluntarily forced into the mouth from the first stomach by a ruminating animal, and leisurely chewed a second time. See ruminant, rumination.—2. A quid.—To chew the cod. See cheu.$*

codbear (kud' bār), n. [After Dr. Cuthbert Gordon, who first brought it into notice.] 1. A purple or violet powder, used in dyeing violet, purple, and crimson, prepared from various species of lichens, especially from Lecanora tartarea, which grows on rocks in northern Europe. It is partially soluble in boiling water, and is red with acids and violet-blue with alkalis. It is prepared nearly in the same way as archil, and is applied to silks and woolsens, having no affinity for cotton. The color obtained from codbear is somewhat fugitive, and it is used chiefly to give strength and brilliancy to blues dyed with indigo.

Codbear-plant (Lecanora tartarea).

2. The plant Lecanora tartarea. Also called codwood.

cudden (kud'n), n. [< E. cuddy.] A clown; a dolt; an idiot.

cudgel (kuj'el), n. [< ME. kuggel, of Celtic origin; W. cogyll, a cudgel, club; orig. perhaps 'distaff'; cf. W. cogyll, a truncheon, distaff, = Gael. cuaille, a club, cudgel, bludgeon, cuigéal, a distaff, = Ir. cuail, a pole, stake, staff, cuigéal, a distaff; cf. Ir. cuach, a bottom of yarn, cuachog, a skein of thread. So E. distaff is named from the bunch of flax on the end.] A short thick stick used as a weapon; a club; specifically, a staff used in cudgel-play.

Mid to holle rode statue, that him is lothest kuggel, lele on the deouel dogge. [With the staff of the holy road, which is to him the hatefulst cudgel, lay on the devil dog.]
Arden, Riddle, p. 202.

Some have been beaten till they know
What wood a cudgel's of by the blow.

To cross the cudgels. See cross.—To take up the cudgels, to engage in a contest or controversy (in self-defense or in behalf of another); accept the gage.

The girl had been reading the "Life of Carlyle," and she took up the cudgels for the old curmudgeon, as King called him.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 98.

cudgel (kuj'el), v. t.; pret. and pp. cudgelled, ppr. cudgeling or cudgelling. [< cudgel, n.] To strike with a cudgel or club; beat, in general.

If he were here, I would cudgel him like a dog.
Shak., I. Hen. IV., III. 3.

At length in a rage the forerger grew,
And cudgell'd bold Robin so sore.
Robin Hood and the Ranger (Child's Ballads, V. 209).

To cudgel one's brains. See brain.

They were often lyable to a night-walking cudgeler.
Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

cudgeling, cudgelling (kuj'el-ing), n. [Verbal n. of cudgel, v.] A beating with a cudgel.

No must fight singly to-morrow with Hector; and is so prophetically proud of an heroidal cudgelling that he raves in saying nothing.
Shak., T. and C., III. 3.

cudgel-play (kuj'el-plā), n. 1. A contest with cudgels.

Near the dying of the day
There will be a cudgel-play.
Where a cockcomb will be broke,
Kre a good word can be spoke.
Witt's Recreations, 1654. (Nares.)

2. The science or art of combat with cudgels. It includes the use of the quarter-staff, back-sword, shillalah, single-stick, and other similar weapons. See these words.

cudgel-proof (kuj'el-prōf), a. Able to resist the blow of a cudgel; insensible to beating or not to be hurt by it.

His doublet was of sturdy buff,
And though not sword, yet cudgel proof.

cudweed (kud'wēd), n. 1. The popular name of the common species of Gnaphalium. Also called chafweed.

There is a plant, which our herbalists call "herbam illi plant," or wricked cudweed, whose younger branches still yield flowers to overtop the elder.
Sp. Hall, Remains, Prophaneness, II. 110.

2. Same as codbear, 2.—Childing cudweed, Gnaphalium Germanicum: so called from its throwing out a circle of shoots at the base, likened to a family of children.—Golden cudweed, of Jamaica, the Pterocaulon nigrum, a white tomentose herb resembling plants of the genus Gnaphalium. (See also sea-cudweed.)

cue (kū), n. [Formerly also kue, and (in def. 3) qu; also often as F. queue; < F. queue, < OF. coue, cue = Fr. coa = Sp. coda, now cola = Pg. cauda, coda = It. coda, < L. coda, cauda, a tail: see cauda, caudal. Cf. coward, from the same ult. source.] 1. The tail; something hanging down like a tail, as the long curl of a wig or a long roll or plait of hair. In this sense also queue. See pigtail.

Each of those cues or locks is somewhat thicker than common whip-cord, and they look like a parcel of small strings hanging down from the crown of their heads.
Cook, Voyages, IV. III. 2.

2. A number of persons ranged in a line, awaiting their turn to be served, as at a bank or a ticket-office. In this sense also queue.—3. (a) Theat., words which when spoken at the end of a speech in the course of a play are the signal for an answering speech, or for the entrance of another actor, etc.

You speak all your part at once, cues and all.—Pyramus, enter; your cue is past; it is "never tire."
Shak., M. N. D., III. 1.

When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer.
Shak., M. N. D., IV. 1.

(b) In music, a fragment of some other part printed in small notes, at the end of a long rest or silence occurring in the part of a voice or an instrument, to assist the singer or player in beginning promptly and correctly. Hence—4. A hint; an intimation; a guiding suggestion.

"The Whig papers are very subdued," continued Mr. Rigby. "Ah! they have not the cue yet," said Lord E. dale.

Such is the cue to which all Rome responds.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 519.

5. The part which one is to play; a course of action prescribed, or made necessary by circumstances.

Were it my cue to fight, I should have known it Without a prompter.
Shak., Othello, I. 2.

The flexible conclave, finding they had mistaken their cue, promptly answered in the negative.
Prescott.

6. Humor; turn or temper of mind.

When they work one to a proper cue,
What they forbid one takes delight to do. Orville.

Was ever before such a grinding out of jigs and waltzes, where nobody was in the cue to dance?
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xix.

My uncle [was] in thoroughly good cue.
Dickens, Pickwick, xlix.

7. A straight tapering rod tipped with a small soft pad, used to strike the balls in billiards, bagatelle, and similar games.—8. A support for a lance; a lance-rest.

cue (kū), v. t. [< cue, n.] To tie into a cue or tail.

They separate it into small locks which they would or cue round with the rind of a slender plant, . . . and as the hair grows the wooling is continued.

cue (kū), n. [Formerly also qu; < ME. cue, ou, or simply q, standing for L. quadrans, a farthing, though the cue seems to have been used for half a farthing. See extract from Minshew.] 1. The name of the letter Q, q.—2. (a) A farthing; a half-farthing.

A cue, i. [i. e.] half a farthing, so called because they set down in the Rattling or Butterlie books in Oxford and Cambridge the letter q, for half a farthing, and in Oxford when they make that cue or q, a farthing, they say, "ap. my q, and make it a farthing, thus, q. But in Cambridge they use this letter, a little a. . . for a

(b) A farthing's worth; the quantity bought with a farthing, as a small quantity of bread or beer.

With rumps and kidneys, and cues of single beer.
Beau, and Fl., Wit at several Weapons, II. 2.

Cry at the buttry-hatch, Ho, Lancelot, a cue of bread, and a cue of beer! Middleton, The Black Book.

cue-ball (kū'bāl), n. In billiards and similar games, the ball struck by the cue, as distinguished from the other balls on the table.

cue-ball (kū'bāl), a. A corruption of skew-bald. [Prov. Eng.]

A gentleman on a cue-ball horse.
J. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xxxix.

cue-rack (kū'rak), n. A rack or stand for holding billiard-cues.

cuerda (kwer'dā), n. [Sp., a measure of length (see def.), lit. a cord, = E. cord: see cord.] 1. The name of several different Spanish units of length. The cuerda of Castile was variously 84 and 84 varas, or 22 feet 7.3 inches and 22 feet 3.7 inches. The cuerda of Valencia was equal to 123 English feet. The cuerda of Buenos Ayres is 161 varas of Castile, or 140 yards 1 inch, English measure.

2. In the province of La Mancha in Spain, a measure of land, one half of the seed-ground for a fanega of corn.

cuerpo (kwer'pō), n. [Sp., < L. corpus, body: see corpus.] The body.

Hot. Cuerpo! what's that?
Tip. Light skipping hose and doublet,
The horse-boy's garb! E. Johnson, New Inn, II. 2.

In (or on) cuervo, without a cloak or upper garment, or without the formalities of a full dress, so that the shape of the body is exposed; hence, figuratively, naked or unprotected.

So they unmantled him of a new Flush Cloak, and my Secretary was content to go home quietly, and in cuervo.
Howells, Letters, I. 1. 17.

cuff<sup>1</sup> (kuf), v. [Appar. < Sw. kuffa, thrust, push, said to be freq. of kufpa, subdue, suppress, cow: see cow.] I. trans. 1. To strike with or as with the open hand.

Cuff him soundly, but never draw thy sword.
Shak., T. N., III. 4.

2. To buffet in any way.

The budded peaks of the wood are how'd,
Caught and cuff'd by the gale. Tennyson, Maud, vi.

II. t. intrans. To fight; scuffle.

The peers cuff to make the rabble sport. Dryden.

cuff<sup>2</sup> (kuf), n. [< cuff<sup>1</sup>, r.] 1. A blow with the open hand; a box; any stroke with the hand or fist.

This mad-brain'd bridegroom took him such a cuff,
That down fell priest and book.
Shak., T. of the N., III. 2.

2. A blow or stroke from or with anything.

With wounding cuff of cannon a fiery ball.
Mir. for Maps, p. 384.

cuff<sup>3</sup> (kuf), n. [Early mod. E. cuffe, < ME. cuffe, coffe, a glove or mitten, prob. < AS. cuffa, found once in sense of 'hood' or 'cap', < ML. cofia, cofea, cuffa, cupha, > also lt. cuffa = F. cuffe, etc., a cap, coif: see coif.] 1. A glove; a mitten.

He cuffed on his clothes i-clouted and i-hole,
His cokers and his cuffs for colde of his nayles.
Piers Plowman (A), vii. 56.

Cuff, glove or metyne (var. mitten), mitta, clouteca.
Prompt. Parv., p. 106.

2. (a) A distinct terminal part of a sleeve at the wrist, intended for embellishment. The cuff was made originally by turning back the sleeve itself and showing either the same material as that of the sleeve or a different material used as a lining. In the fifteenth century a prominent part of the dress was the large cuff, which could be turned down so as to cover the hand to the finger-tips, and when turned back reached nearly to the elbow. In modern times the coat-sleeve has been sometimes made with a cuff which can be turned down over the hand, though not intended to be so used, and sometimes with a semblance of a cuff, indicated by braid or buttons, or by a facing of velvet or other material, or merely by a line or lines of stitching around the sleeve. (b) A band of linen, lace, or the like, taking the place of, and covering a part of the sleeve in the same manner as, the turned-up cuff. In the seventeenth century such cuffs, worn by ladies, were often extremely rich, of expensive lace, and reached nearly to the elbow. Plain linen cuffs were also worn about 1640, and were especially affected by the Puritans in England. When the plain linen wristband worn attached to the shirt by men first came into use, in the early part of the nineteenth century, it was commonly turned back over the sleeve, and was a true cuff. (c) In recent times, a separate band of linen or other material worn about the wrist and appearing below the end of the sleeve. As worn by men, it is buttoned to the wristband of the shirt.—3. That part of a long glove which covers the wrist and forearm, especially when stiff and exhibiting a cylindrical or conical form.

The cuffs of the gauntlets.

J. Hewitt, Ancient Armour, II. p. vii.

cuff<sup>4</sup> (kuf), n. [Sc., cited by Jamieson from Galt; perhaps for scruff, confused with cuff.] The scruff of the neck; the nape.

cuff-frame (kuf'frām), n. A special form of knitting-machine for making the cuffs of knitted garments.

Cufic, Kufic (kū'fik), a. and n. [< Cufa + -ic.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Cufa, or Kufa, an old city south of Babylon, the capital of the califs before the building of Bagdad, which contained the most expert and numerous copyists of the Koran; specifically applied to the characters of the Arabic alphabet used in the time of Mohammed, and in which the Koran was written.

II. n. The Cufic characters collectively.

He . . . made notes of all that I told him in the quaint character used by the Mughrebins or Arabs of the West, which has considerable resemblance to the ancient Cufic.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 23.

Sometimes written Cuphic.

cui bono (kū bō nō), [L. cui est bono? to whom is it (for) a benefit? cui, dat. of cuius, who; est, 3d pers. sing. pres. ind. act. of esse, be; bono, dat. of bonum, a good: see who, be, and bona.] For whose benefit? popularly, but incorrectly, for what use or end?

ly called cuirassiers in the French and other European armies. The cuirass seems to have been first adopted in England in the reign of Charles I., when the light cavalry were armed with buff coats, having the breast and back covered with steel plates. Subsequently this piece of armor fell into disuse, and was resumed by the English only after the battle of Waterloo, where the charges of the French cuirassiers were very effective.

2. Any similar covering, as the protective armor of a ship; specifically, in soil., some hard shell or other covering forming an indurated defensive shield, as the carapace of a beetle or an armadillo, the bony plates of a mailed fish, etc.—Double cuirass, the usual form of cuirass of the first half of the fifteenth century, consisting of a plastron and a panderon moving freely one over the other.

cuirassé (kwē-rās't or kwē-rās'), a. [< cuirass + -ed.] Furnished with a cuirass or other protective covering: as, cuirassé ships; cuirassé fishes.

The cuirassé sentry walked his sleepless round.

O. W. Holmes, On Poetry, II.

To make the steel plates necessary for cuirassé vessels.

New York Weekly Post, April 8, 1868.

cuirassier (kwē-rā-sēr'), n. [< F. cuirassier, < cuirasse, cuirass.] A mounted soldier armed with the cuirass. The cavalry of the time of the English civil wars was commonly so armed. The word was introduced in the seventeenth century to replace platiere (which see). In modern European armies there are generally one or two regiments of cuirassiers. See cuirass.

Cuirassiers, all in steel for standing fight.

Milton, P. R., III. 528.

I conducted him with a guard of honour, consisting of a squadron of the first Cuirassier regiment, to Bellevue.

Quoted in Lovel's Bismarck, I. 561.

cuirassine, n. [OF., dim. of cuirasse, cuirass.] In armor, an additional thickness put upon the breastpiece of a corselet, or a plate of steel secured to the brigandine to give additional defense. Compare mammellère, 2, plastron, placcate, pectorale.

cuir-bouilli, cuir-bouilly (kwē-bō'ly), n. [F. cuir bouilli (> ME. curboully, quirboully, etc.), lit. boiled leather: see cuirass and boil.] Leather prepared by boiling and pressing, so that it becomes extremely hard and capable of preserving permanently the shape and surface-decoration given it, and can afford considerable resistance to sword-cuts and other violence. It has been much used from the middle ages to the present day for armor, crests, helmets, and ornamental utensils of many kinds. For elaborate work it is now prepared by boiling and then pressed in molds; for common work it is merely soaked in hot water before pressing.

His jamboux were of quirboully. Chaucer, Sir Thopas.
cuirtan (kwē'r'tan), n. White twilled cloth made in Scotland from fine wool, for undergarments and hose. Planché.

cuishes (kwish'ez), n. pl. [Also cuisses; < ME. cuishens (for **cuissches*) (Wright), cuishes (Halliwell), < OF. cuissache (Cotgrave), pl. of cuissel (= lt. coxiale), also cuissere and cuissart (> mod. F. cuissard), also cuissote, pl., armor for the thighs (mod. F. cuissot, a haunch of venison) (= Sp. quijote, formerly quirote (whence the name of the famous Don Quixote: see quis-otic) = Pg. coxote, armor for the thighs; ML. cuissellus, cuisserrinus, cuissetus, after the OF. forms), < cuisse, F. cuisse = Pr. coissa, cuissa = Pg. coxa = lt. coxia (ML. cuissia), the thigh, < L. coxa, the hip: see coxa.] Armor for the thighs; specifically, plate-armor worn over the chausses of mail or other material, whether in a single forging or in plates lapping over one another. In the fully developed plate-armor of the fifteenth century the cuishes became barrels of steel, each in two parts, divided vertically, hinged on one side, and fastening on the other with hooks, turn-buckles, or the like. See second cut under armor.

I saw young Harry, with his beaver on,
His cuisses on his thighs, gallantly arm'd,
Rise from the ground like feather'd Mercury.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 1.

And how came the cuishes to be worse tempered than the rest of his armour, which was all wrought by Vulcan and his journeyman?
Dryden, Epic Poetry.

All his greaves and cuisses dash'd with drops
Of onset. Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

Cuishes to cuishes, in close order in the march of cavalry. Grose.

cuisine (kwē-sēn'), n. [F., = Pr. cocina = Sp. cocina = Pg. cocina = lt. cucina, < ML. coquina, L. coquina, a kitchen (> also AS. cycene, E. kitchen), orig. fem. of coquimus, of or pertaining to cooking, < coquere, cook: see cook, and kitchen, which is a doublet of cuisine.] 1. A kitchen.—2. The culinary department of a house, hotel, etc., including the cooks.—3. The manner or style of cooking; cookery.

Culicidae (kū-lis-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Culex (Culicidae) + -idae.] A family of nematoceros dipterous insects, containing the gnats, midges, mosquitoes, etc. They have a long slender proboscis of seven pieces, filiform or plumose antennae, contiguous eyes without ocelli, and wings with few cells. The eggs are laid on substances in the water, in which the larvae live. The latter are provided with respiratory organs at the hinder end of the body, and consequently swim head downward. There are about 150 species of the family. See cuts under gnat, midge, and mosquito.

culiciform (kū-lis-i-fōrm), a. [NL., culiciformis, < L. culex (culico), a gnat or flea, + forma, shape.] Resembling a gnat; having the characters of the Culicidae or Culiciformes.

Culiciformes (kū-lis-i-fōrmēs), n. pl. [NL., pl. of culiciformis; see culiciform.] A group of gnat-like insects, including such genera as Chironomus and Corsetra, equivalent to a family Chironomidae, coming next to the Culicidae.

culicifuge (kū-lis-i-fūj), n. [NL., < L. culex (culico), a gnat, + fugare, drive away.] An antidote against gnats and mosquitoes. Also culexifuge.

Culicivora (kū-lis-i-vō-rā), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1827), < L. culex (culico), a gnat, + vorare, eat, devour; see voracious.] 1. A genus of South American clamatorial flycatchers, of the family Tyrannidae. The type is C. stenura, a Brazilian species.—2. A genus of American oscine passerine birds; the gnatocheters: a synonym of Polioptila. Swainson, 1837.

Cullawau bark. See bark 2.

culinary (kū'lī-nā-rī), adv. In the manner of a kitchen or of cookery; in connection with, or in relation to, a kitchen or cookery.

culinary (kū'lī-nā-rī), a. [F. culinaire = Sp. Pg. culinario, < L. culinaris, < culina, OL. culina, a kitchen; origin uncertain. Hence (from L. culina) E. kiln, q. v.] Pertaining or relating to the kitchen, or to the art of cookery; used in kitchens or in cooking: as, a culinary vessel; culinary herbs.

She was . . . mistress of all culinary secrets that Northern kitchens are most proud of.

O. W. Holmes, A Mortal Antipathy, l. culinary, n. See culinary 1.

culi (kū'lī), v. t. [ME. cullen, gather, pick, < OF. cullir, cuelir, cullir (> E. coil), cull, collect, < L. colligere, collect, pp. collectus, > E. collect: see collect, and coil, which is a doublet of cull.] 1. To gather; pick; collect.

And much of wild and wonderful,
In these rude isles, might Fancy cull.

Scott, L. of L. M., vi. 22.
No cup had we:
In mine own lady palms I cull'd the spring

That gather'd trickling dropwise from the cleft Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

2. To pick out; select or separate one or more of from others: often with out.

Come knights from east to west,
And cull their flower, Ajax shall cope the best.

Shak., T. and C., ii. 1.
Go to my wardrobe,
And of the richest things I wear cull out

What thou think'st fit.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, iii. 1.

Steel, through opposing plates, the magnet draws,
And steely atoms cull'd from dust and straw.

Crabbe, Parish Register.
The eye to see, the hand to cull
Of common things the beautiful.

Whittier, To A. K.
3. To inspect and measure, as timber. [Canada.]

cull (kū'l), n. [Cull, v.] Something picked or culled out; specifically, an object selected from among a collection or aggregate, and placed on one side, or rejected, because of inferior quality: usually in the plural: as—(a) In live-stock breeding, inferior specimens, unfit to breed from. (b) In timbering, inferior or defective pieces, boards, planks, etc.

cull (kū'l), v. t. A Middle English form of kilp.

cull (kū'l), v. t. A variant of colp.

Cull, kiss, and cry "sweetheart," and stroke the head
Which they have branch'd, and all is well again!

For'd-Broken Heart, ii. 1.

cull (kū'l), n. [Contr. of cully, q. v.] A fool; a dupe. [Slang.]

cull (kū'l), n. [E. dial. (Gloucestershire), perhaps a particular use of cull, a fool, dolt.] A local English (Gloucestershire) name for the fish miller's thumb.

cullender, n. See colander.

cullengey, n. A weight of the Carnatic, equal to 8½ grains Troy.

culleock, n. See cullyock.

culler (kū'ler), n. 1. One who picks, selects, or chooses from many.—2. An inspector; in Massachusetts, in colonial times, a government officer appointed for the inspection of imports of fish; also, one appointed to inspect exports of staves.—3. One who culls timber; an inspector and measurer of timber.

cullet (kū'let'), n. [Perhaps ult. < F. couler, flow, run; cf. cullis, cullis. Cf. cull.] In glass-manuf., refuse and broken glass, especially crown-glass, collected for remelting.

cullet (kū'let'), n. Same as culet, 2. Groce.

cullens, n. See culeus.

cullibility (kū-lī-bil'i-ti), n. [Cull + -bility, after gullibility.] Credulity; readiness to be duped; gullibility.

Providence never designed him [Gay] to be above two and twenty, by his thoughtlessness and cullibility.

Swift, To Pope.

If there is not a fund of honest cullibility in a man, so much the worse.

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 94.

cullible (kū'lī-bl), a. [Cull, after gullible.] Gullible; easily cheated or duped.

culling (kū'ling), n. Anything selected or separated from a mass, as being of a poorer quality or inferior size: generally in the plural.

Those that are big at of bone I still reserve for breed,
My cullings I put off, or for the chapman feed.

Drayton, Nymphidia, vi. 1490.

cullion (kū'yūn), n. [Early mod. E. also cullion, cullen, < F. couillon = Pr. couillon = Sp. cujón = It. coglion, testicle (hence It. coglion, dial. cujón) (> Sp. cujón = F. cujón, > ME. conjoun, conjoun, conious, etc.: see conjourn), a mean wretch, < L. colens, scrotum, same as culrus, culleus, a bag. Cf. cully.] 1. A testicle. Cotgrave.—2. A round or bulbous root; an orchis; specifically, in plural form (cullions), the standerwort, Orchis mascula.—3. A mean wretch; a low or despicable fellow.

Away, base cullions!
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., l. 2.

Perish all such cullions!

Massey, The Guardian, ii. 4.

cullionly (kū'yūn-lī), a. [Cullion + -ly.] Like a cullion; mean; base.

I'll make a sop o' the moonshine of you, you whoreson cullionly barber-monger.

Draw. Shak., Lear, ii. 2.

cullis (kū'lis), n. [Also cullies, cullies; early mod. E. also colles, colies, ME. cullies, colies, < OF. and F. coulis, cullis, < coulter, run, strain: see colander.] Broth of boiled meat strained.

Gold and themselves [usurers] to be beaten together, to make a most cordial cullis for the devil.

Webster, White Devil, v. 1.

I counsel you to a warm breakfast upon a cullis, which shall restore the tone of the stomach.

Scott, Kenilworth, iii.

cullis (kū'lis), n. [F. coulisier, a groove (see coulisier), < coulter, run, glide: see colander, and cf. cullis and portuculica.] In arch.: (a) A gutter in a roof. (b) Any channel or groove in which an accessory, as a side scene in a theater, is to run.

cullisant, cullisont, cullisant (kū'lī-sen, -son, -zan), n. Corruptions of cognisance, 3 (a).

But what badge shall we give, what cullisont?
B. Jonson, Case is Altered, iv. 4.

A blue coat without a cullisont will be like haberdashery without mustard.

Owles Almanack, 1618.

cull-me-to-you (kū'mē-tō'yū), n. Same as cull-me-to-yum.

cullock (kū'lk), n. See cullyock.

columbines, n. An obsolete form of columbine 2.

cully (kū'lī), n.; pl. cullies (-is). [Old slang, an abbr. of cullion, 3, with sense modified appar. by association with gull. According to Leland, of gipsy origin—"Sp. Gypsy chulai, a man, Turk. Gypsy khalai, a gentleman." A fellow; a "cove"; especially, a verdant fellow who is easily deceived, tricked, or imposed on, as by a sharper, jilt, or strumpet; a mean dupe. [Slang.]

Thus, when by rooks a lord is pilled,
Some cully often wins a bot

By venturing on the cheating side.

Swift, South Sea Project.

I have learned that this fine lady does not live far from Covent Garden, and that I am not the first cully whom she has passed upon for a countess.

Addison.

cully (kū'lī), v. t.; pret. and pp. cullied, ppr. culling. [Cully, n.] To deceive; trick; cheat, or impose upon; jilt; gull. [Slang.]

Tricks to cully tools.

Poinsett, Divine Attributes, Goodness.

cullism (kū'lī-izm), n. [Cully + -ism.] The state of being a cully. [Slang.]

Without dwelling upon these less frequent instances of eminent cullism, what is there so common as to hear a fellow curse his fate that he cannot get rid of a passion to a jilt!

Addison, Spectator, No. 486.

cullyock (kū'lī-ok), n. [Origin obscure.] A bivalve mollusk, Tapes pullastra, better known as pullet. Also culleock, cullock. [Shetland.]

culm (kūlm), n. [Also dial. coom; appar. < ME. culme, culm, soot, smoke, > culmy, coomy.] 1. Coal-dust; slack; refuse of coal. [Pennsylvania.]—2. In mining, a soft or slaty and inferior kind of anthracite, especially that occurring in Devonshire, England.—3. The name given by some geologists to a series of rocks which occupy the position of the Carboniferous limestone (see carboniferous), but which, instead of being developed in the form of massive calcareous beds, are made up of slates, sandstones, and conglomerates, and occasional beds of coal, usually of inferior quality.

The fauna of the culm is in general much less abundant than that usually found in the Carboniferous limestone proper; its flora is, however, in some regions exceptionally rich. The rocks designated as culm occur extensively along the borders of Russia, Poland, and Austria; and similar ones, in the same geological position, are found developed on a considerable scale in Scotland, and also in Ireland. In the last-named country they are locally known as calp. See calp.

culm (kūlm), n. [Culm, a stalk; cf. calamus, a stalk (see calamus), = E. hawlum, q. v.] In bot., the jointed and usually hollow stem of grasses. It is in most cases herbaceous, but is woody in the bamboo and some other stout species. The term is also sometimes applied to the solid jointless stems of sedges.

culm-bar (kūlm-bār), n. A peculiar bar used in grates designed for burning culm or slack coal.

culmen (kūl'men), n. [L.: see culminate.] 1. Top; summit.

At the culmen or top was a chapel.

Str. T. Herbert, Travels, p. 227.

2. [NL.] Specifically, in ornith., the median lengthwise ridge of the upper mandible. See first cut under bill.

The culmen is to the upper mandible what the ridge is to the roof of a house; it is the upper profile of the bill—the highest middle lengthwise line of the bill. . . In a great many birds, especially those with depressed bill, as all the ducks, there is really no culmen; but then the median lengthwise line of the surface of the upper mandible takes the place and name of culmen.

Cosens, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 104.

3. [NL.] In anat., the upper and anterior portion of the monticulus of the vermis superior of the cerebellum. Also called oculocorn.

culmicolous (kul-mik'ô-lus), a. [L. culmus, a stalk, culm (see culm), + colore, inhabit.] Growing upon culms of grasses: said of some fungi.

culminal (kul'mi-nal), a. [L. culmen (culmin) + -al.] Of or pertaining to the culmen or summit; uppermost; apical.

culminant (kul'mi-nant), a. [ML. culminans (-t)s, ppr. of culminare: see culminate, v.] Culminating; reaching the highest point.

I did spy

Sun, moon, and stars, by th' painter's art appear,

At once all culminant in one hemisphere.

A. Brome, To his Mistress.

culminate (kul'mi-nât), v. i.; pret. and pp. culminated, ppr. culminating. [ML. culminatus, pp. of culminare (> It. culminare = Sp. Pg. culminar = F. culminer, > D. kulmineren = G. kulmineren = Dan. kulminere, < L. culmen (culma-) (> It. culmine = Sp. culmen = Pg. culmo), the highest point, older form columen, > ult. E. columen, q. v.] 1. To come to or be on the meridian; be in the highest point of altitude, as a star, or, according to the usage of astronomers, reach either the highest or the lowest altitude.

As when his beams at noon

Culminate from the equator.

Milton, P. L., III. 617.

The regal star, then culminating, was the sun.

Dryden, Vind. of Duke of Guise.

The star of Guise, brilliant with the conquest of Calais, now culminated to the zenith.

Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 190.

2. To reach the highest point, apex, or summit, literally or figuratively.

The mountains forming this cape culminate in a grand conical peak. B. Taylor, Lands of the Sarcoph, p. 189.

Both records (the biblical and the scientific) give us a grand procession of dynasties of life, beginning from the lower forms and culminating in man.

Darwin, Nature and the Bible, p. 119.

culminate (kul'mi-nât), a. [ML. culminatus, pp.: see the verb.] Growing upward, as distinguished from a lateral growth: applied to the growth of corals. Dana.

culminating (kul'mi-nâ-ting), p. a. [Ppr. of culminate, v.] 1. Being at or crossing the meridian; being at its highest elevation, as a planet.—2. Being at its highest point, as of rank, power, magnitude, numbers, or quality.

This Madonna, with the sculpture round her, represents the culminating power of Gothic art in the thirteenth century.

Ruskin.

Beauty is, even in the beautiful, occasional—or, as one has said, culminating and perfect only a single moment, before which it is unripe, and after which it is on the wane.

Emerson, Domestic Life.

culmination (kul'mi-nâ'shon), n. [= F. culmination (> D. kulminatie = G. culmination = Dan. kulmination) = Sp. culminacion = Pg. culminacio = It. culminazione, < *ML. *culminatio* (-n), < culminare, pp. culminatus: see culminate, v.] 1. The position of a heavenly body when it is on the meridian; the attainment by a star of its highest or lowest altitude on any day.—2. The highest point or summit; the top; the act or fact of reaching the highest point: used especially in figurative senses.

We . . . wonder how that which in its putting forth was a flower should in its growth and culmination become a thistle.

Farndon, Sermons, p. 422.

Lower or upper culmination, the attainment by a star of its lowest or highest altitude on any day.

culminicorn (kul'mi-n'kôr-n), n. [L. culmen (culmin), top, + cornu = E. horn.] (ones, 1866.) In ornith., the superior one of the horny pieces into which the sheath of the bill of some birds, as albatrosses, is divided; the piece which increases the culmen of the bill.

The culminicorn is transversely broad and rounded.

Cosens, Proc. Phila. Acad., 1866, p. 175.

culmy (kul'mi), a. and n. Same as colmy.

culot (kû'lo), n. [F. culot, < L. culus, posterior, bottom.] 1. An iron cup inserted in the con-cal opening of the Minie and other early projectiles. Farrow, Mil. Enyc.—2. In decorative art, a rounded form, like a calyx or the sheaf of a bud, from which issue scrolls or the like.

culottic (kû-lot'ik), a. [F. culotte, breeches, + -ic. Cf. sansculottic.] Having or wearing breeches; hence, pertaining to the respectable classes of society: opposed to sansculottic. [Rare.]

Young Patriotism, Culottic and Sansculottic, rushes forward.

Carlyle, French Rev., II. vi. 3.

culottism (kû-lot'izm), n. [As culottic + -ism.] The principles or influence of the more respectable classes of society. See sansculottism.

He who in these epochs of our Europe founds on garnitures, formulas, culottisms of what sort soever, is founding on old cloth and sheepskin, and cannot endure.

Carlyle, French Rev., III. vii. 1.

culpability (kul-pa-bil'i-ti), n. [= F. culpabilité = Sp. culpabilidad = Pg. culpabilidade, < *L. as if *culpabilis* (-t)s, < culpabilis: see culpable.] The state of being culpable or censurable; blamableness.

culpable (kul'pa-bl), a. and n. [ME. culpable, culpable, culpable, < OF. culpable, colpable, culpable, F. culpable = Fr. culpable = Sp. culpable = Pg. culpavel = It. colpevole, < L. culpabilis, blameworthy, < culpate, blame, condemn, < culpa, fault, crime, mistake. See culpa.] 1. a. 1. Deserving censure; blamable; blameworthy: said of persons or their conduct.

That he had given way to most culpable indulgences, I had before heard hinted.

Darham, Ingoldby Legends, I. 181.

A permission voluntarily given for a bad act is culpable, as well as its actual performance.

Miszt, Nature and Thought, p. 242.

2. Guilty.

These being perhaps culpable of this crime.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

The Mayor of London sat in Judgment upon Offenders, where many were found culpable, and lost their Heads.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 189.

culrage (kul'râj), n. [Early mod. E. also culrage, kulridge; < ME. culrage, culrage, culrayge, culraiche, culrathe; < OF. culrage, culrage, F. outrage, < cul (< L. culus), the posterior, + rage, < L. rabies, madness, rage; equiv. to the E. name arse-smart.] The water-pepper or smartweed, Polygonum Hydropiper.

Cult (kult), n. [F. culte = Sp. Pg. It. culto, < L. cultus, cultivation, worship, < colere, pp. cultus, till, cultivate, worship. Cf. cultivate, culture, etc., colony, etc.] 1. Homage; worship; by extension, devoted attention to or veneration for a particular person or thing: as, the Shaksperian cult.

Every man is convinced of the reality of a better self, and of the cult or homage which is due to it.

Shaftesbury, Advice to an Author, III. § 1.

2. A system of religious belief and worship; especially, the rites and ceremonies employed in worship. Also cultus.

Cult is a term which, as we value exactness, we can ill do without, seeing how completely religion has lost its original signification.

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 172.

3. A subject of devoted attention or study; that in which one is earnestly or absorbingly interested.

cultch (kuleh), n. [Cf. culch.] The materials used to form a spawning-bed for oysters; also, the spawn of the oyster.

cultel (kul'tel), n. [OF. cultel, < L. cultellus, dim. of cultor, a knife: see colter and cutlas.] A long knife carried by a knight's attendant.

cultellarius (kul-te-lâ'ri-us), n.; pl. cultellarii (-i). [ML., < L. cultellus, a knife: see cultel.] 1. In the middle ages, an irregular soldier whose principal weapon was a heavy knife or short sword. Cultellarii were often attendants upon a knight, and followed him to battle. See couture. Also formerly cusculi.

2. A bandit or outlaw.

cultellation (kul-te-lâ'shon), n. [L. cultellus, a knife, + -ation.] The determination of the exact point on the ground vertically beneath a point at some height above it, by letting fall a knife or other pointed object; also, the use of this method in measuring land on a hillside so as to obtain the measures projected upon a horizontal plane.

cultellus (kul'tel'us), n.; pl. cultelli (-i). [L., a knife: see cultel.] In entom., one of the lancet-like mandibles of a mosquito or predatory fly.

culter (kul'tér), n. Same as colter.

cultirostral (kul-ti-rôs'trâl), a. An erroneous form of cultirostral.

Cultirostres (kul-ti-rôs'trêz), n. pl. An erroneous form of Cultirostres.

cultism (kul'tizm), n. [Cult + -ism.] The pedantic style of composition affected by the cultists.

The cultism of Góngora, the artifice of which lies solely in the choice and arrangement of words.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 360.

cultist (kul'tist), n. [Cult + -ist; equiv. to Sp. cultero, culterano, an affected purist.] One of a school of Spanish poets who imitated the pedantic affectation and labored elegance of Góngora y Argote, a Spanish writer (1561-1627).

A century earlier the school of the cultists had established a dominion, ephemeral, as it soon appeared, but absolute while it lasted.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 391.

cultivable (kul'ti-vâ-bl), a. [= F. cultivable = Sp. cultivable = Pg. cultivavel = It. coltivabile, < *ML. as if *cultivabilis*, < cultivare, till: see cultivate.] Capable of being tilled or cultivated; capable of improvement or refinement.

The soils of cultivable lands hold in a greater or less proportion all that is essential to the growth of plants.

J. R. Nichols, Firsides Science, p. 151.

The descendant of a cultivated race has an enhanced aptitude for the reception of cultivation; he is more cultivable.

Whitney, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 766.

cultivable (kul'ti-vâ-tâ-bl), a. [Cultivate + -able.] Cultivable.

Large tracts of rich cultivable soil.

British and Foreign Rev., No. II., p. 265.

cultivate (kul'ti-vât), v. t.; pret. and pp. cultivated, ppr. cultivating. [ML. cultuare, pp. of cultuare (> It. cultuare, cultuare = Sp. Pg. cultivar = OF. cultuier, cultuier, cultuier, cultuier, etc., F. cultiver), till, work, as land, < cultivus, tilled, under tillage, < L. cultus, pp. of colere, till: see cult.] 1. To till; prepare for crops; manure, plow, dress, sow, and reap; manage and improve in husbandry: as, to cultivate land; to cultivate a farm.

I have had a large, a fair, and a pleasant field; so fertile that, without my cultivating, it has given me two harvests in a summer.

Dryden, To Sir R. Howard.

2. To raise or produce by tillage: as, to cultivate corn or grass.—3. To use a cultivator upon; run a cultivator through: as, to cultivate a field of standing corn. See cultivator (n). [U. S.]

—4. To improve and strengthen by labor or study; promote the development or increase of; cherish; foster: as, to cultivate talents; to cultivate a taste for poetry.

As your commissioners our poets go,

To cultivate the virtue which you sow.

Dryden, University of Oxford, Prolog., I. 12.

5. To direct special attention to; devote study, labor, or care to; study to understand, derive advantage from, etc.: as, to cultivate literature; to cultivate an acquaintance.

The ancient philosophers did not neglect natural science, but they did not cultivate it for the purpose of increasing the power . . . of man. Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

He who cultivates only one precept of the Gospel, to the exclusion of the rest, in reality attends to no part at all. J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, 1. 300.

The study of History is . . . as Coleridge said of Poetry, its own great reward, a thing to be loved and cultivated for its own sake.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 24.

6. To improve; meliorate; correct; civilize.

To cultivate the wild licentious savage.

Addison, Cato, 1. 4.

cultivated (kul'ti-vā-ted), p. a. Produced by or subjected to cultivation; specifically, cultured; refined; educated.

My researches into cultivated plants show that certain species are ext' act, or becoming extinct, since the historical epoch.

De Candolle, Orig. of Cultivated Plants (trans.), p. 450.

In proportion as there are more thoroughly cultivated persons in a community will the finer uses of prosperity be taught and the vulgar uses of it become disreputable.

Lowell, Oration, Harvard, Nov. 8, 1884.

cultivating (kul'ti-vā-ting), p. a. Engaged in the processes of cultivation; agricultural. [Rare.]

The Russian Village Communities were seen to be the Indian Village Communities, if anything in a more archaic condition than the eastern cultivating group.

Morse, Early Law and Custom, p. 240.

cultivation (kul-ti-vā-sh'n), n. [= F. cultivation, OF. cultivacion, cultivacion, cultivacion, etc., = Sp. cultivacion = Pg. cultivacão = It. coltivazione, < *ML. *cultivatio(n)-*, < cultivare, cultivate: see cultivate.] 1. The act or practice of tilling land and preparing it for crops; the agricultural management of land; husbandry in general.

Such is the nature of Spain; wild and stern the moment it escapes from cultivation; the desert and the garden are ever side by side.

Irvine, Alhambra, p. 278.

2. Land in a cultivated state; tilled land with its crops. [Rare.]

It is curious to observe how defined the line is between the rich green cultivation and the barren yellow desert.

K. Sartorius, in The Sudan, p. 12.

3. The act or process of producing by tillage: as, the cultivation of corn or grass.—4. The use of a cultivator upon growing crops.—5. The process of developing; promotion of growth or strength, physical or mental: as, the cultivation of the oyster; the cultivation of organic germs, or of animal virus; the cultivation of the mind, or of virtue, piety, etc.

No capital is better provided [than Madrid] with sundry of the higher means to cultivation, as its Royal Armory, its Archeological Museum, and its glorious Picture Gallery . . . remind one.

Lathrop, Spanish Vistas, p. 25.

6. The state of being cultivated; specifically, a state of moral or mental advancement; culture; refinement; the union of learning and taste.

You cannot have people of cultivation, of pure character, . . . professing to be in communication with the spirit world and keeping up constant intercourse with it, without its gradually reacting on the whole conception of that other life.

O. W. Holmes, The Professor, 1.

Fractional cultivation. See the extract.

Fractional cultivation consists in the attempt to isolate by successive cultivations the different organisms that have been growing previously in the same culture.

H. Klein, Micro-Organisms and Disease, p. 26.

—Syn. 5. Training, Discipline, Education, etc. See instruction.—6 and 6. Refinement, etc. See culture.

cultivator (kul'ti-vā-tor), n. [= F. cultivateur, OF. cultivoor, cultivoor, etc., = Sp. Pg. cultivador = It. coltivatore, < *ML. as if *cultivator*, < cultivare, cultivate: see cultivate.] One who or that which cultivates. (a) One who tills or prepares land for crops, or carries on the operations of husbandry in general; a farmer; a husbandman; an agriculturist. (b) A producer by cultivation; a grower of any kind of products: as, a cultivator of oysters.

It has been lately complained of, by some cultivators of clover-grass, that from a great quantity of the seed not any grass springs up.

Boyle.

(c) An agricultural implement used to loosen the earth and uproot the weeds about growing crops which are planted in rows or hills. It consists of points or shares attached to a framework, usually adjustable in width, and having draft-wheels which govern the depth to which the ground is broken up. It is drawn between the rows of plants by a horse. There are also light forms which are operated by hand. (d) One who devotes special attention, care, or study to some person or pursuit.

The most successful cultivators of physical science.

Bucke, Civilization, 1. 1.

cultivate, cultivated (kul'trēt, -tēd), a. [L. cultivate, knife-shaped, < cultus, a knife: see cultus, cultus.] Sharp-edged and pointed; culter-shaped, or shaped like a pruning-knife, as a body that is thick on one edge and acute on the other: as, a cultivate leaf; the beak of a bird is convex and cultivate.

cultiform (kul'tri-fōrm), a. [= F. cultriforme, < L. culter, a knife, + forma, shape.] Cultrate: specifically applied, in soot, to a tapering or elongate part or organ when it is bounded by three sides meeting in angles, one of the sides being shorter than the other two, so that the section everywhere is an acute-angled triangle.

cultirostral (kul'tri-ro's-trāl), a. [NL. cultrirostris, < L. culter, a knife, + rostrum, a beak, + -al.] 1. Having a bill shaped somewhat like the culter of a plow, or adapted for cutting like a knife: as, cultirostral oscine birds.—2. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cultrirostres.

Also, erroneously, cultirostral.

Cultrirostres (kul'tri-ro's-trēs), n. pl. [NL. pl. of cultrirostris: see cultirostral.] 1. In Cuvier's system of classification, a family of Grallæ, including the cranes, courlans, herons, storks, and sundry other large waders, as distinguished from the Pressirostres or plover group, and the Longirostres or snipe group. [Not in use.]—2. In some later systems, a group of laminiplan-tar oscine passerine birds, as the crows and corvine birds generally.

Also, erroneously, Cultrirostres.

cultrivorous (kul'triv'ō-rus), a. [= Sp. cultrivora, < L. culter, a knife, + vorare, swallow, devour.] Swallowing or seeming to swallow knives. Dunlopian. [Rare.]

culturable (kul'tur-ə-bl), a. [F. culturable, < culture, + -able.] 1. Adapted to culture; cultivable: as, a culturable area.

Recent explorers affirm that there is no reason why these canals should not be again filled from those rivers, when the intervening country . . . would become culturable.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 48.

2. Capable of becoming cultured or refined.

[Rare in both uses.] cultural (kul'tūr-əl), a. [= F. cultural, < culture + -al.] Pertaining to culture; specifically, pertaining to mental culture or discipline; educational; promoting refinement or education.

In every variety of cultural condition.

Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 172.

In its cultural development, China stands wholly for itself.

Science, IV. 21.

culturate, v. t. [ML. cultivatus, pp. of culturare, cultivate, < L. cultura, cultivation, culture: see culture, n.] To cultivate. Capt. John Smith.

culture (kul'tūr), n. [F. culture = Pr. Sp. Pg. cultura = It. cultura, cultura = G. Dan. kultúr, < L. cultura, cultivation, tillage, care, culture, < cultus, pp. of colere, till, cultivate: see cult.] 1. The act of tilling and preparing the earth for crops; tillage; cultivation.

So that these three last were slower than the ordinary wheat of itself; and this culture did rather retard their advance.

Bacon, Sylva Sylvarum, § 402.

In vain our toil.

Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 14.

2. The act of promoting growth in animals or plants, but especially in the latter; specifically, the process of raising plants with a view to the production of improved varieties.

One might wear any passion out of a family by culture, as skillful gardeners hit a colour out of a tulip that hurts its beauty.

Tatler.

These bud variations . . . occur rarely under nature, but they are far from rare under culture.

Darwin, Origin of Species, 1.

Hence—3. In bacteriology: (a) The propagation of bacteria or other microscopical organisms by the introduction of the germs into suitably prepared fluids or other media, or of parasitic fungi upon living plants. Also called cultivation.

The only thing to be done now was to take advantage of what had previously been learned as to the attenuation of virus, and endeavor, through successive cultures, to progressively lessen the harmfulness of the rabid poison.

Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8092.

(b) The product of such culture.

This bacillus [of typhoid fever] is difficult to stain in tissue, while pure cultures stain readily with the usual dyes.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 765.

4. The systematic improvement and refinement of the mind, especially of one's own.

[Not common before the nineteenth century, except with strong consciousness of the metaphor involved, though used in Latin by Cicero.]

Rather to the pomp and ostentation of their wit, than to the culture and profit of their minds.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 14.

The culture and manurance of minds in youth hath much a forcible (though unseen) operation as hardly any length of time or contention of labour can countervail it afterwards.

[English ed.], Works, III. 416.

O Lord, if thou suffer not thy servant, as I may pray before thee, and thou give us seed unto our heart, and culture to our understanding, that there may come fruit of it, how shall each man live that is corrupt, who beareth the place of a man?

2 Ecd. viii. 6.

Culture, the acquainting ourselves with the best that has been known and said in the world, and thus with the history of the human spirit.

M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, Pref.

5. The result of mental cultivation, or the state of being cultivated; refinement or enlightenment; learning and taste; in a broad sense, civilization: as, a man of culture.

Culture or Civilization, taken in its wide ethnographic sense, is that complex whole which includes knowledge, belief, art, morals, law, custom, and any other capabilities and habits acquired by man as a member of society.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, 1. 1.

Culture in its widest sense, I take it, thorough acquaintance with all the old and new results of intellectual activity in all departments of knowledge, so far as they conduce to welfare, to correct living, and to rational conduct.

W. K. Brooks, Law of Heredity, p. 272.

6. The training of the human body.

Amongst whom [the Spartans] also both in other things, and especially in the culture of their bodies, the nobility observed the most equality with the commons.

Hobbes, tr. of Thucydides, 1.

7. The pursuit of any art or science with a view to its improvement.

Our national resources are developed by an earnest culture of the arts of peace.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., 1. 134.

8. Cultivated ground.

Proceeds the caravan

Through lively spreading cultures, pastures green,
And yellow tillages in opening woods.

Dyer, The Fleeces.

Gelatin culture, a growth of bacteria in a medium made of the consistency of jelly by means of gelatin.—Pure culture, in bacteriology, a growth of one kind of bacteria free from admixture of other varieties.—Solid culture, a culture of bacteria, etc., for which the medium is a solid at ordinary temperatures, usually gelatin or a preparation, such as agar-agar, made from algae.—Test-tube culture, a growth of bacteria in a test-tube.—Syn. 4-6. Assimilation, Cultivation, Culture. Each of these words may represent a process or the result of that process. Only refinement can, when unqualified, represent a process or result carried too far. Refinement is properly most negative, representing a freeing from what is gross, coarse, rude, and the like, or a bringing of one out of a similar condition in which he is supposed to have been at the start. Cultivation and culture represent the person or the better part of him as made to grow by long-continued and thorough work. Refinement and cultivation, as thus representing the more negative and the more positive aspects of the improvement of man, were much more common until within thirty years; since then culture has largely supplanted cultivation: this change, coming when great attention was concentrating about the subject of the development of all the departments of the nature of man, produced a great enlargement of the definition of culture, for a time the improvement and gratification of taste being magnified in undue proportion by some, and by others the mere acquisition of knowledge. The word is now applied to the improvement of the whole man, bodily, mentally, and spiritually, although bodily training is not prominent unless specially mentioned; the moral and the spiritual are jealously included. Culture may be used of the state of society as well as of the man; refinement and cultivation refer primarily to the state or the individual. As referring to either, culture in its broadest sense may be called the highest phase of civilization.

What do we mean by this fine word Culture, so much in vogue at present? What the Greeks naturally expressed by their paideia, the Romans by humanitas, we less happily try to express by the more artificial word Culture.

When applied to the human being, it means, I suppose, the "educing or drawing forth [of] all that is potentially in a man," the training [of] all the energies and capacities of his being to the highest pitch, and directing them to their true ends.

Shaftesbury, Culture and Religion, 1.

culture (kul'tūr), n. t.; pret. and pp. cultured pp. culturing. [F. culture, n. Cf. ML. cultura: rare: see culturate.] To cultivate: as, "cultured vales." Shenstone, Elegies, xiv.

culture-bulb (kul'tūr-bulb), n. A bulb-shaped culture-tube. Dolley, Bacteria Investigation p. 76.

culture-cell (kul'tūr-sel), n. A small moist chamber for the microscopic observation of the culture of organic germs. It is usually made by fixing to a microscopical slide a short glass cylinder; upon the latter a cover glass is placed, and the culture is fixed in a drop of fluid on the lower surface of the cover-glass thus being available for microscopic examination at a time without disturbance. The culture is kept moist by water in the bottom of the cell.

cultured (kul'jûrd), a. Having culture; refined.

The sense of beauty in nature, even among cultured people, is less often met with than other mental endowments.

Is. Taylor.

culture-fluid (kul'jûr-flû'id), n. A fluid culture-medium.

Diluting the culture-fluid containing the various species to a very large extent with some sterile indifferent fluid.

B. Klein, Micro-Organisms and Diseases, p. 27.

cultureless (kul'jûr-less), a. Without culture; uncultured.

culture-medium (kul'jûr-mê'di-um), n. A substance, solid or fluid, in which bacteria or other microscopic organisms are cultivated. Among the frequently used culture-media are meat-broths, decoctions of dung, hay, and various vegetable substances, sugar-solution, orange-juice, boiled potatoes, gelatin, and gelatin-like preparations of algae, as agar agar.

culture-oven (kul'jûr-uv'n), n. A small warmed chamber, kept at a uniform temperature, in which certain bacterial cultures are made. See culture, 8 (a).

culture-tube (kul'jûr-tûb), n. A tube in which bacteria, etc., are cultivated.

culturist (kul'jûr-ist), n. [< culture + -ist.] 1. A cultivator; one who produces anything by cultivation.

The oyster industry is rapidly passing from the hands of the fisherman into those of the oyster culturist.

Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 108.

2. An advocate of the spread of culture or the education of the intellectual and esthetic powers; especially, one who regards culture in this sense rather than religion as the central element in civilization.

The Culturists . . . say that, since every man must have his ideal—material and selfish, or unselfish and spiritual—it lies mainly with culture to determine whether men shall rest content with grosser aims or raise their thoughts to the higher ideals.

cultus (kul'tus), n. [= G. cultus, etc., < L. cultus, care, culture, refinement; see cult.] 1. A system of religious belief and worship: same as cult, 2.

Buddhism, a missionary religion rather than an ancestral cultus, eagerly availed itself of the art of writing for the propagation of its doctrines.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 343.

Pure ethics is not now formulated and concretized into a cultus, a fraternity with assemblies and holy-days, with song and book, with brick and stone.

Emerson, N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 417.

2. The moral or esthetic state or condition of a particular time or place.

cultus-cod (kul'tus-kod), n. [Said to be < Chinoos cultus, worthless, of little value, + E. cod.] A chiroid fish, Ophiodon elongatus, of a lengthened form, with a long pointed head and many dorsal spines and rays. It reaches a length of from 3 to 4 feet and a weight of from 30 to 60 pounds. It abounds along the Pacific coast of the United States, and is one of the most important food-fishes of that region. Also called green-cod, and by many other names.

Cultus-cod (Ophiodon elongatus)
(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

cultur, n. A Middle English form of color.
-culus, -cula, -culum [L. m., f., neut., respectively, of -culus, a compound dim. term., consisting of -c, an adj. term. used as dim. (see -to), + -ul-us, a dim. term.: see -ule, -ol, -le, etc.] A diminutive termination in Latin words, some of which have entered English without change, as fasciculus, curriculum, operculum, operculum, tenaculum, vinculum, etc., but which have usually taken the form -culus, as in animalculus, resticulus, etc., or more frequently -ole, as in articula, auricula, particula, conventicula, versicula, ventricula, etc. See -culus, -ole.

culver<sup>1</sup> (kul'ver), n. [< ME. culver, culver, culvere, culvye, culvye, culvye, a dove, prob. a corruption of L. columba, a dove; see Columba.] A dove; a pigeon. [Now only local.]

Crye to Crist that he wolde his culvers sende,
The while he is the holy gost that out of hevene descended.

Piers Plowman (7), xviii. 244.

Lyke as the Culver, on the bared bough,
Sits mourning for the absence of her mate.

Spenser, Sonnets, lxxxviii.

culver<sup>2</sup> (kul'ver), n. [Short for culverin, perhaps with reference to culver<sup>1</sup>, a dove, as guns were sometimes called by the names of birds; e. g., falcon and saker.] Same as culverin.

Falcon and saker, on each tower,

Stood prompt their deadly hail to shower.

Scott, I. of I. M., iv. 17.

culver-dung (kul'ver-dung), n. The droppings of pigeons.

culverfoot (kul'ver-fû't), n. [< culver<sup>1</sup> + foot.] A species of crane's-bill, Geranium columbinum, the leaves of which are cleft like a bird's foot.

culver-house (kul'ver-hous), n. [< ME. culver, culver-hous; < culver<sup>1</sup> + house.] A dovecote.

Under thi culver hous in alle the brede

Make mewes twayne.

Paradise, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 21.

culverin (kul'ver-in), n. [< OF. coulverine, coulverine, F. coulverine, < ML. colubrina, a culverin, dim. of colubra (< OF. coulverre), a culverin, lit. a serpent, < L. colubra, fem. of coluber, a serpent; see Coluber.] An early name of the cannon. (a) Loosely, any small gun: especially so used in the earliest days of artillery. (b) In the sixteenth century, the heaviest gun in ordinary use, as on shipboard or the like, corresponding nearly to the long 18-pounders of later times. It is also mentioned as throwing a shot of 15 pounds' weight. In the seventeenth century the name was retained for this piece, though much heavier guns were in use. Also called culver and whole culverin. See drum-culverin. Sometimes spelled culverina.

Hurrah! the foes are moving! Hark to the mingled din
Of life, and steel, and tramp, and drum, and roaring culverin.

Macaulay, 177.

The Constable advanced with four pieces of heavy artillery, four culverines, and four lighter pieces.

Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 177.

Bastard culverin, in the sixteenth century, a cannon smaller than the culverin, firing a projectile usually from 5 to 8 pounds in weight.

culverineer (kul'ver-in-êr'), n. [< culverin + -eer.] One who had charge of the loading and firing of a culverin.

Even as late as the 15th century a guild was founded at Ghent, composed of the culverineers, arquebusers, and gunners, in order to teach the burghers the use of firearms.

culverkey (kul'ver-kê), n. [Appar. < culver<sup>1</sup>, a dove, + key, the husk containing the seed of an ash (or maple: see ash-key and maple-key); but the connection of culver<sup>1</sup>, a dove, with the ash-tree is not obvious. Columbine and culver<sup>1</sup>, however, are (prob.) etymologically related (ult. < L. columbus, a dove): see culver<sup>1</sup>.] 1. A bunch of the pods of the ash-tree.—2. A meadow-flower, probably the bluebell, Scilla nutans.

Looking down the meadows, [I] could see, here a boy gathering lilies and lady-smocks, and there a girl cropping culverkeys and cowslips.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, xi.

Purple narcissus like the morning rays,
Pale gander-grass, and azure culverkeys.

J. Davers, quoted in I. Walton's Complete Angler, 1.

Culver's-phryic (kul'ver-fis'ik), n. [After a Dr. Culver, who used it in his practice.] The popular name of Veronica (Leptandra) virginica. The thick, blackish root has a nauseous, bitter taste, acting as a violent emeto-cathartic, and has long been in use in medicine.

Culver's-root (kul'ver-rût), n. Same as Culver's-phryic.

culvert<sup>1</sup> (kul'vert), n. [Appar. an accom., in imitation of cover, a covered place, of F. coulvertre, a channel, gutter, also a colander, < culver, run, drain: see cullis, colander.] An arched or flat-covered drain of brickwork or masonry carried under a road, railroad, canal, etc., for the passage of water.

culvert<sup>2</sup>, a. [ME. also culvert, culward, < OF. culvert, culvert, culvert, culvert, culvert, culvert, also culbert, culbert (ML. culbertus, also, after F., culberta), low, servile, as noun a serf, vassal: see culbert.] False; villainous.

The porter is culvert and felon.

King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 60.

The king hede a steward
That was fel and culward.

Chron. of Eng. (Hutton's Mss. Rom., II.), 1. 787.

Vnder paine of Culvertage and perpetuall servitude.

Daniel, Hist. Eng., p. 116.

In early times attendance at the posse comitatus was enforced by the penalty of culvertage, or turntail, viz., forfeiture of property and perpetual servitude.

Encyc. Brit., VIII. 448.

culvertail (kul'ver-tâl), n. [< culvert<sup>1</sup> + tail. < OF. dovetail.] In joinery and carp., a dovetail joint, as the fastening of a ship's carlings into the beam.

culvertailed (kul'ver-tâld), a. United as fastened, as pieces of timber, by a dovetail joint; dovetailed: used by shipwrights.

culvertship, n. [ME. culvertship; < culver<sup>2</sup> + -ship.] Falsehood; wickedness.

After the like time that ure Lowerd thermide brouhte so to grunde his [the devil's] kintne culvertships & his prude stonthe.

Anon. Rhed., p. 204.

culverwort (kul'ver-wért), n. [< culver<sup>1</sup> + wort.] The columbine, Aquilegia vulgaris: so named from the resemblance of its flowers to the heads of little pigeons around a dish. See out under columbine.

culy, n. See kuk.

cunt, v. An obsolete spelling of come.

Cuma (kû'mâ), n. [NL., appar. for **Cyma* (see cyma, in other senses), < Gr. κύμα, a wave, a waved molding, etc.: see cyma, cyma.] 1. In conch., a genus of rhachiglossate pectinibranchiate gastropods, of the family Muretidae. Hemphrys, 1795.—2. A genus of crustaceans, of the family Cumidae, also giving name to a group Cumaceans. Also **Cyma*.

Cumaceans (kû-mâ'sê-j), n. pl. [NL., < Cuma + -acea.] A group of thoracostracous crustaceans, of which the type is the genus Cuma. The Cumaceans resemble the arthropodous Crustaceans in having eyes without a movable stalk; but they closely resemble the Schistopoda in the form of the body, thus corresponding with the lower developmental stages of the decapodous crustaceans.

The Cumaceans . . . are very remarkable forms allied to the Schistopoda and Nebalia on the one hand, and on the other to the Eriophrachma and Copepoda; while they appear, in many respects, to represent persistent larvae of the higher Crustaceans.

cumacean (kû-mâ'sê-j), a. and n. 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Cumaceans. Also cumaceous.

2. n. A member of the Cumaceans.

cumaceous (kû-mâ'sê-j), a. Same as cumacean.

Cumman (kû-mê'an), a. Of or pertaining to Cumæ, an ancient city on the coast of Campania, reputed the earliest of the Greek settlements in Italy.—Cumman sibyl, one of the legendary prophetic women whose authority in matters of divination was acknowledged by the Romans. See sibyl.

cumarin (kû'ma-rin), n. Same as coumarin.
cumbent (kum'bent), a. [*< L. *cumbent(-e)*, ppr. of **cumbere* (only in comp. concumbere, incumbere, etc.), nasalized form of cubare, lie down: see cubit, and cf. accumbent, incumbent, procumbent, recumbent.] Lying down; reclining; recumbent. [Rare.]

At the fountains are as many cumbent figures of marble under very large niches of stone.

Keelyn, Diary, Nov. 12, 1844.

A handsome monument of Caen stone, being a cumbent effigy on an altar-tomb, was placed on the north side of the chancel [in Whalley church] in 1842.

Baines, Hist. Lancashire, II. 7, note.

cumber (kum'bér), v. t. [*< ME. cumbren, cumbren, < OF. combre, hinder, obstruct, commonly in comp. encombrer, F. encombrer = Pr. encombrar = It. ingombrare, < ML. incumbere, hinder, obstruct, encumber, < L. in- + ML. *cumbus, cumbus, obstruction, etc., < L. cumbus, a heap: see cumber, n., and cf. encumber, of which cumber, v., is in part an abbreviated form.*] 1. To burden or obstruct with or as with a load or weight, or any impediment; load excessively or uselessly; press upon; shake up; clog.

Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumberest thou the ground?

Luke xiii. 7.

A variety of frivolous arguments cumber the memory to no purpose.

Locke.

The fallen images

Over the weedy courts.

Bryant, Rymn to Death.

The whole slope is cumbered by masses of rock.

Tyndal, Forms of Water, p. 44.

Why asks he what avails him not in fight,
And would he cumber and retard his right?

Dryden.

3. To trouble; perplex; embarrass; distract.

For gif thou comest again Conscience thou cumberest this silence.

And so witnesseth goddes word and hallowit both.

Piers Plowman (A), x. 81.

Domestic fury, and fierce civil strife,
Small cumber all the parts of Italy.

Shak., J. C., III. 1.

cumber (kum'bér), n. [This noun, though later than the verb in E., and derived from it, is in the other tongues the orig. of the verb. Formerly also written cumber; < OF. cumber, an obstruction of stakes, etc., in a river to catch

Answer to: increasing the mass, weight, number, extent, amount, or force of (things of the same kind): as, cumulative materials; cumulative arguments or testimony. See below.—2. Increasing by successive additions: as, the cumulative action of a force.

I cannot help thinking that the indefinable something which we call character is cumulative—that the influence of the same climate, scenery, and associations for several generations is necessary to its gathering head, and that the process is disturbed by continual change of place.

Lovell, Firebird Travels, p. 90.

No modern writer save De Quincey has sustained himself so easily and with such cumulative force through passages which strain the reader's mental power.

Stedman, Viet. Poets, p. 401.

34. Composed of aggregated parts; composite; brought together by degrees.

As for knowledge which man receiveth by teaching, it is cumulative and not original.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 147.

Cumulative action, in med., the property of producing considerable, and more or less sudden, effect after a large number of apparently ineffective doses as of a drug or poison.—Cumulative argument, an argumentation whose force lies in the concurrence of different probable arguments tending to one conclusion.—Cumulative dividend. See dividend.—Cumulative evidence, evidence of which the parts reinforce one another, producing an effect stronger than any part taken by itself.—Cumulative language, several legacies in the same will to the same person which, though expressed in the same or similar language, are such as to be deemed additional to one another, and not merely a repeated expression of one intention already expressed.—Cumulative offense, in law, an offense committed by a repetition of acts of the same kind, on the same day or on different days. Hard.—Cumulative sentence, in law, a sentence in which several fines or several terms of imprisonment are added together, on account of conviction of several similar offenses.—Cumulative system of voting, in elections, that system by which each voter has the same number, or within one of the same number, of votes as there are persons to be elected to a given office, and can give them all to one candidate or distribute them, as he pleases. This variety of proportional or minority representation is practised in elections to the Illinois House of Representatives, and to some extent in British elections.

cumulatively (kū'mp-lā-tiv-lī), adv. In a cumulative manner; increasingly; by successive additions.

As time goes on and our knowledge of the planetary motions becomes more minutely precise, this method [of determining the parallax of the sun] will become continually and cumulatively more exact. C. A. Young, The Sun, p. 41.

cumuli, n. Plural of cumulus.

cuneator (kū'nē-āt-or), n. [ML., cunear, coin, L. make wedge-shaped, wedge, cuneus, a wedge: see cuneus.] An official formerly intrusted with the regulation of the dies used in the mints in England. The office was abolished with the abolition of the provincial mints.

The office of cuneator was one of great importance at a time when there existed a multiplicity of mints.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 480.

cunel, n. Plural of cuneus.

cuneiform (kū'nē- or kū'nē-fōrm), a. and n. [Also improp. cuneiform; L. cuneus, a wedge, + forma, shape.] 1. a. 1. Having the shape or form of a wedge; cuneate. Specifically—(a) Applied to the wedge-shaped or arrow-headed characters, or to the inscriptions in such characters, of the ancient Mesopotamians and Persians. See arrow-headed.

The cuneiform inscriptions of the ancient Mesopotamians are not of historical import, like the Egyptian, but have reference only to the business routine of the time. Von Soden, Unters. Alt. Mitt. (Bresl.), p. 21.

(b) In anatom., said of parts or joints which are attached by a thin but broad band, and thicken gradually to a suddenly truncated apex. (c) In anat., applied to certain wedge-shaped carpal and tarsal bones. See phalanx below. 2. Occupied with or versed in the wedge-shaped characters, or the inscriptions written in them: as, "a cuneiform scholar," Sir H. Rawlinson.

Cuneiform bone, in anat.: (a) A carpal bone at the ulnar side of the proximal row. Also called the triquetrum and pyramide, from its shape in the human subject. See cut under hand. (b) One of three bones of the foot, of the distal row of tarsal bones, on the inner lateral side, in relation with the first three metatarsal bones. The cuneiform bones are distinguished from one another as the inner, middle, and outer, or the internal, mesocuneiform, and external cuneiform; also as the entocuneiform, mesocuneiform, and exocuneiform. In the human foot they are wedged in between the scaphoid, the cuboid, and the heads of three metatarsals, and fitted to one another like the stones of an arch. These bones contribute much to the elasticity of the arch of the instep. See cut under foot.—Cuneiform cartilage. See cartilage.—Cuneiform columna, Burdach's columns (which see, under column).—Cuneiform deformation of the skull. See deformation.—Cuneiform palpi, those palpi in which the last joint is cuneiform.—Cuneiform tubercles, the cartilages of Wrisberg.

II. n. A cuneiform bone: as, the three cuneiforms of the foot.

cuneiformis (kū'nē-fōrm'is), n.; pl. cuneiformis (-mī-). [NL., neut. (sc. os, bone) of cuneiformis: see cuneiform.] One of the cuneiform bones of the wrist or of the instep: more fully called os cuneiforme, plural ossa cuneiformia. The three tarsal cuneiform bones are distinguished as cuneiforme internum, medium, and externum.

Cuneirostris (kū'nē-ros'trēs), n. pl. [NL., L. cuneus, a wedge, + rostrum, beak.] In Blyth's system of classification (1849), a series or superfamily of his Picoides, consisting of the woodpeckers, honey-guides, and barbets: opposed to Levirostris.

cuneocuboid (kū'nē-ō-kū'boid), a. [L. cuneiform + cuboid.] In anat., pertaining to the cuneiform bones and the cuboides.

cuneoscapoid (kū'nē-ō-skap'oid), a. [cuneiform + scapoid.] In anat., pertaining to the cuneiform bones and the scapoid.

cunette (kū-net'), n. [F., appar. dim. formed from L. cuneus, a wedge.] In fort.: (a) A deep trench sunk along the middle of a dry moat, to make the passage more difficult. (b) A small drain dug along the middle of the main ditch, to receive the surface-water and keep the ditch dry.

cuneus (kū'nē-us), n.; pl. cunei (-i). [NL., L. cuneus, a wedge, ML. also a corner, angle, a stamp, die, > OF. coin, > E. coin: see coin.] Hence cuneate, cuneiform, etc.] 1. In anat., the triangular lobule on the median surface of the cerebrum, bounded by the parieto-occipital and calcarine fissures. See cerebrum.—2. In anatom., a triangular part of the hemielytrum found in certain heteropterous insects, inserted like a wedge on the outer side between the corium and the membrane. It is generally of a more or less obtuse consistence, and is separated from the corium by a flexible suture. Also called apophysis.

cuniculate (kū-nik'ū-lāt), a. [L. cuniculus, a passage underground, a cavity, cuniculus, a rabbit: see cuniculus.] In bot., traversed by a long passage open at one end, as the peduncle of Tropaeolum.

cuniculi, n. Plural of cuniculus.

cuniculous (kū-nik'ū-lus), a. [L. cuniculus, a rabbit, cony: see cuniculus.] Relating to rabbits. [Rare.]

cuniculus (kū-nik'ū-lus), n.; pl. cuniculi (-li). [L., also cuniculum, a canal, cavity, hole, pit, mine, an underground passage, lit. a (rabbit) burrow, cuniculus, a rabbit, cony, whence ult. E. cony, q. v.] 1. In archaeol., a small underground passage; specifically, one of the underground drains which formed a close network throughout the Roman Campagna and certain other districts of Italy. They were constructed by a race that was dominant before the age of Roman supremacy, and are now known to have remedied the malarious character of those regions, which has returned since they were choked up.

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of lemmings, of the family Muridae and subfamily Arvicolinae: so called because the animals somewhat resemble small rabbits. The cranial and dental characters are diagnostic: there are no obvious external ears, the feet and tail are short and densely furred, the pollex is rudimentary, and the two middle fore claws are proportionally enlarged, and often duplicated by a secondary deciduous growth of horny substance. C. lemmings (or torquatus) is the Hudson's Bay lemming or hare-tailed rat of arctic America, Greenland, or corresponding latitudes in the old

It was one of the days when, in spite of twilching the line and using all the tricks we could think of, the cunners would either eat our bait or keep away altogether.

S. O. Jewett, Deephaven, p. 161.

cunnet, n. Same as conyger.

cunning (kun'ing), n. [ME. cunning, cunnyng, cunnyng, kunnyng, coning, conyng, etc., in form and use the verbal noun (not found in AS.) of cunnen, pres. ind. can, know (cf. Icel. kunnandi, knowledge, < kunna, know), but in form and partly in sense as if < AS. cunung, trial, test, < cunian, try, test, > E. cun, con.] Cunning, while thus the verbal noun, associated with cunning, the ppr. of can, know, also includes historically the verbal noun of can, can, which is now separated, as conning, in mod. sense, the act of studying. 1. Knowledge; learning; special knowledge; sometimes implying occult or magical knowledge.

A tree of cunnyng of good and yuel. Wyrt, Gen. II. 2.

That alle the folke that ys alyve
Ne han the cunnyng to discryve
The thynges that I herde there.

Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 306.

I believe that all these three persons (in the Godhead) are even in power, and in cunning, and in might, full of grace and of all goodness.

Thorep, Confession, in Foxe's Book of Martyrs.

2. Practical knowledge or experience; skill; dexterity.

If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. Ps. cxxxvii. 5.

3. Practical skill employed in a secret or crafty manner; craft; artifice; skillful deceit.

The continual habit of dissimulation is but a weak and sluggish cunning, and not greatly politic.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 343.

Nor did I use an engine to entrap
His life, out of a slavish fear to combat Youth, strength, or cunning.

Pope, The Broken Heart, v. 3.

This is a trap, isn't it? a nice stroke of cunning, hey?

Sheridan, The Duenna, II. 1.

4. Disposition to employ one's skill in an artful manner; craftiness; guile; artifice.

We take cunning for a sinister and crooked wisdom; and certainly there is great difference between a cunning man and a wise man, not only in point of honesty, but in point of ability.

Bacon, Cunning.

5. The natural wit or instincts of an animal; as, the cunning of the fox or hare. -Syn. 3 and 4. Craft, craftiness, shrewdness, subtlety, finesse, duplicity, intrigue, guile.

Though I be bought all cunning
Upon the forme of this writing Gower, Conf. Amant, III. 23.

She did impart,
Upon a certain day,
To him her cunning magic art.

The Seven Champions of Christendom (Child's Ballads, I. 85).

2. Having knowledge acquired by experience or practice; having technical knowledge and manual skill; skilful; dexterous. [Now chiefly literary and somewhat archaic.]

He was a cunning hunter. Gen. xxv. 27.

Aboliah . . . an engraver, and a cunning workman, and an embroiderer in blue, and in purple, and in scarlet, and fine linen. Ex. xxxviii. 23.

We do not wonder at man because he is cunning in procuring food, but we are amazed with the variety, the superfluity, the immensity of human talents.

Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, III.

3. Exhibiting or wrought with ingenuity; skilful; curious; ingenious.

Apollo was god of shooting, and Author of cunning playing upon Instruments. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 64.

All the more do I admire Joins of cunning workmanship.

Tennyson, Vision of Sin, iv.

4. Characterized by or exercising crafty ingenuity; artfully subtle or shrewd; knowing in guile; guileful; tricky.

Oh you're a cunning boy, and taught to lie
For your lord's credit!

Bacon, and Pl., Philaster, II. 3.

Hinder them (children), as much as may be, from being cunning; which, being the ape of wisdom, is the most distant from it that can be.

Locke, Education, § 140.

5. Marked by crafty ingenuity; showing shrewdness or guile; expressive of subtlety: as, a cunning deception; cunning looks.

Accounting his integrity to be but a cunning face of falsehood. Sir P. Sidney.

O or his face there spread a cunning grin.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 316.

6. Curiously or quaintly attractive; subtly interesting; piquant; commonly used of something small or young; as, the cunning ways of a child or a pet animal. [U. S.]

As a child she had been called cunning, in the popular American use of the word when applied to children; that is to say, piquantly interesting.

E. Eggleston, The Graysons, I.

-Syn. 4. Cunning, Artful, Sly, Subtle, Shrewd, Tricky, Adroit, Wily, Crafty, Intriguing, sharp, fox. All these words suggest something unkind and deceptive. Cunning, literally knowing, and especially knowing how, now implies a disposition to compass one's ends by concealment; hence we speak of a fox-like cunning. Artful indicates greater ingenuity and ability, the latter, however, being of a low kind. Sly is the same as cunning, except that it is more vulgar and implies less ability. ("A col-fox, full of sly iniquity." Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 306.) ("Envy works in a sly, imperceptible manner." Watts.) Subtle implies concealment, like cunning, but also a marked ability and the power to work out one's plans without being suspected; hence, while cunning is applicable to brutes, subtle is too high a word for that, except by figurative use. The rabbit is cunning enough to hide from the dog; Mephistopheles is subtle. (For the favorable meanings of subtle, see astute. For the good senses of shrewd, see acute.) In its unfavorable aspects shrewd implies a penetration and judgment that are somewhat narrow and worldly-wise, too much so to deserve the name of sagacity or wisdom. (See astute.) Tricky is especially a word of action; it expresses the character and conduct of one who gets the confidence of others only to abuse it by acts of selfishness, especially cheating. Adroit, in a bad sense, expresses a ready and skilful use of trickery, or facility in performing and escaping detection of reprehensible acts (See adroit.) Wily is appropriate where a person is viewed as an opponent in real or figurative warfare, against whom wiles or stratagems are employed: a wily adversary is one who is full of such devices; a wily politician is one who is notably given to advancing party interests by leading the opposite side to commit blunders, etc. A crafty man has less ability than a subtle man, and works more by deception or knavery than the shrewd man; he is more active than the cunning man, and more steadily active than the sly man; he is on the moral level of the trickish man. Intriguing is applied where the plots are secret arrangements made with others, perhaps against a third party, and especially of a complicated character.

cunning (kun'ing), n. [ME. cunnyng, coning, conyng, var. of cony, conyng, etc., whence mod. E. cony, coney, q. v.] The form cunning remains in mod. use only as applied to the lamprey, and in the proper names Cunningham, Conyngnam, Conington, etc. See cony.] 1. Res. T. Adams, Works, I. 484.

2. To perform the operation of cupping: as, to cup for inflammation.—3. In golfing, to hit or break the ground with the club when striking the ball. Jamieson.

cup-and-cone (kup'and-kōn'), n. In metal, an arrangement at the mouth of a blast-furnace by which ore, flux, or fuel can be added, without allowing any sensible escape of the furnace-gases, when these, as is usually the case, are taken off for heating purposes.

cup-and-saucer (kup'and-sā-sēr), a. Shaped like a cup and its saucer taken together.—Cup-and-saucer limpet, a shell of the genus Calyptraea so named because the limpet-like shell has a cup-like process in the interior.

cup-anvil (kup'an'vil), n. In a metallic cartridge, a cup-shaped piece placed on the inner side of the head to strengthen it.

cup-bearer (kup'bār'er), n. 1. An attendant at a feast who conveys wine or other liquors to the guests.—2. Formerly, an officer of the household of a prince or noble, who tasted the wine before handing it to his master.

For I was the king's cupbearer.

Neh. I. 11.

cupboard (kup'erd), n. [Early mod. E. also cupbord, cupbord, often spelled cupbord, sometimes cobord, to suit the pron.; ME. cupbord, cobepord, < cup, cuppe, cup, + bord, board.]

1. Originally, a table on which cups and other vessels, of gold or silver, or of earthenware, for household use or ornament, were kept or displayed; later, a table with shelves, a sideboard, buffet, or cabinet, open or closed, used for such purpose; in modern use, generally, a series of shelves, inclosed or placed in a closet, for keeping cups, dishes, and other table-ware. A cupboard of large size and lavish ornament, in the second form, was called a court-cupboard, and was especially intended for the display of plate, etc. This form is represented by the modern sideboard, with open shelves above and a closet below.

The kynges cope-borde was closed in silver.

Morie Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 208.

2. A similar sideboard, cabinet, or closet of shelves for the keeping of provisions about to be used. Such a cupboard was formerly called specifically a livery-cupboard, and in it was placed the ration, called livery, allowed to each member of the household.

Going to a corner cupboard, high up in the wall, he pulled a key out of his pocket, and unlocked his little store of wine, and cake, and spirits.

Mrs. Gascoill, Sylvia's Lovers, III.

Hence—3. The set or collection of silver or gold plate, fine glass, decorated ceramic ware, etc., usually kept in a cupboard. Compare ordnance, 4.

There was also a Cupbord of plate, most sumptuous and rich.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 312.

A cupboard love is seldom true,

A love sincere is found in few. Poor Robin.

cupboard (kup'erd), v. t. [cupboard, n.] To gather as into a cupboard; hoard up.

Only like a gulf it [the belly] did remain
In the midst of the body, tide and unchange, Still encompassing the viand. Shak., Cor., I. 1.

cupboardy (kup'erd-i), a. [cupboard + -y.] Like a cupboard. Moss Braddon.

cup-coral (kup'kor'al), n. 1. A corallite.—2. A coral polypidom of which the whole mass is cup-shaped, as in the family Cyathophylloidea. cupes (kū-pē'), n. A head-dress of lace, gauze, etc., having lappets hanging down beside the face. It was worn at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and preceded the tall commode.

cupel (kū'pel or kup'el), n. [Also written cupel, cupple, and coppel, coppie (now commonly cupel, based directly upon the ML. form); < F. coupelle = Sp. copela = Pg. copella, copella = It. coppella, < ML. cupella, a little cup, a little tun, dim. of cupa, cup, L. cupa, a tun (> cupella, a small cask): see cup.] In metal, a small vessel made of pulverized bone-earth, in the form of a frustum of a cone, with a cavity in the larger end, in which lead containing gold and silver is cupelled. See cupellation. In assaying with the cupel the lead is absorbed by the porous bone-ash into which it sinks.

The stuff whereof cupples are made, which they put into furnaces, upon which fire worketh not.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

cupel (kū'pel), v. t.; pret. and pp. cupeled, cupelled, ppr. cupeling, cupelling. [cupel, n.] To perform the process of cupellation upon.

These [silver and alloyed gold] are wrapped together in a piece of sheet lead, and cupelled or melted in a porous crucible called a cupel.

Wheatley and Delamotte, Art Work in Gold and Silver, p. 8.

cupel-dust (kū'pel-dust), n. Powder used in purifying metals. Also coppie-dust.

cupellate (kū-pe-lāt), v. t. [cupel + -ate.] To cupel. [Rare.]

cupellation (kū-pe-lā'shon), n. [cupellate + -ion.] Separation of gold and silver from lead by treatment in a cupelling-furnace or in a cupel. The process depends upon the property possessed by lead of becoming oxidized when strongly heated, while the precious metals are not so affected. The lead, becoming oxidized, forms litharge, which collects on the surface and flows toward the edges of the metallic mass, whence it is removed, the silver remaining in the form of a metallic disk if the operation is on a large scale, as in the process of working argentiferous lead in the cupellation-furnace, or in that of a small rounded globe or button if the cupel is used (see cupel), as is commonly done in assaying silver ore which contains gold.

Cupes (kū'pēs), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1801), < (f) L. cupes, cuppes, fond of delicacies, dainty, connected with cupedo, cuppedo, a titbit, delicacy, orig. = cupido, desire: see (*up*id).] The typical genus of the family Cupessidae. C. lobiceps is a North American species.

Cupessidae (kū-pēs'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cupes + -idae.] A family of sericicorn Coleoptera or beetles. The ventral segments are free; the tarsi are five-jointed; the first ventral segment is not elongated; the hind coxae are sulate for the reception of the thighs; the front coxae are transverse; the onychium is small or wanting; the head is constricted behind; and the eyes are smooth. The family comprises only the three genera Cupes, Priaema, and Omma, and the few species known are sordid-colored beetles of medium size, which probably breed in decaying wood.

cupful (kup'fūl), n. [cup + -ful, 3.] The quantity that a cup holds; the contents of a cup.

Thane cho wente to the welle by the wode enis,
That alle wellyde of wyne, and wonderliche ryunes;
Kaughte up a cuppe-fulle, and coverde it faire.

Morie Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 339.

cup-gall (kup'gāl), n. A singular kind of gall found on the leaves of the oak and some other trees, of the figure of a cup, or a drinking-glass without its foot, adhering by its point or apex to the leaf, and containing the larva of a small fly. The insect which makes cup-galls is Cecidomyia poculorum.

cup-guard (kup'gārd), n. A sword-guard in which the hand is protected by a hollow metal cup opening toward the hand. It usually surrounds the blade beyond and outside of the cross-guard. See Mit.

Cuphea (kū'fē-ā), n. [NL., with reference to the gibbous base of the calyx, < Gr. κύπετρον, a hump.] A genus of Lythraea, herbs or undershrubs, natives of tropical America and Mexico, of which three species occur in the United States. Many have bright-colored flowers, and Flowering branch of Cuphea lanceolata.

one, C. pinnatifida, is common in greenhouses under the name of Cuphead.
Cuphead, n. See Cuphead.
Cup-head (kup'hil'ted), n. Furnished with a cup-guard, as a sword. See Cup-guard.
Cupid (kū'pid), n. [L. Cupido, personification of cupido (cupido), desire, passion, < cupere, desire: see cover.] In Rom. myth., the god of love, identified with the Greek Eros, the son of Hermes (Mercury) and Aphrodite (Venus). He is generally represented as a beautiful boy with wings, carrying a bow and quiver of arrows, and is often spoken of as blind or blindfolded. The name is often given in art to figures of children, with or without wings, introduced, sometimes in considerable number, as a motive of decoration, and with little or no mythological allusion.

Cupid.—Vatican Museum, Rome.

The seal was Cupid bent above a scroll, And o'er his head Uranian Venus hung, And raised the blinding bandage from his eyes.

Cupidity (kū'pid-i-ti), n. [F. cupidité = Pr. cupiditas = It. cupiditas, < L. cupiditas (-is), desire, covetousness, < cupido, desirous, < cupere, desire: see cover.] 1. An eager desire to possess something; inordinate desire; immoderate craving, especially for wealth or power; greed.

No property is secure when it becomes large enough to tempt the cupidity of indigent power.

Burke.

Many articles that might have aroused the cupidity of unambitious thieves.

Lathrop, Spanish Vistas, p. 193.

2. Specifically, sexual love. [Rare.]

Love, as it is called by boys and girls, shall even be the subject of my ridicule. . . . villainous cupidities!

Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, VI. 106.

—Syn. 1. Concupiscence, Cupidity, etc. (see concupiscence), craving, hankering, grasping, lust for wealth, etc.

Cupidone (kū'pi-dōn), n. [F. Cupidon, < L. Cupido, Cupid: see Cupid.] A flowering plant of gardens, Catananche corymbosa.

Cupidonia (kū'pi-dō-ni-ā), n. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1858), extended from Cupido, the specific name of the bird, < L. Cupido, Cupid.] A genus of gallinaceous birds of the grouse family, Tetraonidae; the pinnated grouse. They have a hump or little wing-like tufts of feathers on the sides of the neck, which may have been fancifully likened to Cupid's wings; a short tail with broad feathers; the head somewhat crested; the lower partly feathered; and the plumage barred crosswise on the under parts. The genus is based upon the common pinnate-bird of the United States, Cupido cupido. A second smaller kind is C. pallidior. Also called Tympanuchus.

Cupidous, a. [L. cupidus, desiring, desirous, longing, < cupere, desire, long for: see cover.] Full of cupidity. Coles, 1717.

Cup-mushroom (kup'mush'rōm), n. See mushroom.

Cupola (kū'pō-lā), n. [= F. coupole = Sp. cúpula = Pg. cupula, cupola = D. kuppel = G. Dan. kuppel = Sw. kupol, < L. cupola, a dome, < L. cupula, dim. of L. cupa, a tub, cask, ML. cupa, It. coppa, etc., a cup: see cup.] 1. In arch., a vault, either hemispherical or produced by the revolution about its axis of two curves intersecting at the apex, or by a semi-ellipse covering a circular or polygonal area, and supported either upon four arches or upon solid walls.

The Italian word signifies a hemispherical roof which covers a circular building, like the Pantheon at Rome or the temple of Vesta at Tivoli. Most modern cupolas are semi-elliptical, cut through their shortest diameter; but the greater number of ancient cupolas were hemispherical. In colloquial use the cupola is often considered as a diminutive dome, or the name is specifically applied to a small structure rising above a roof and often having the character of a tower or lantern, and in no sense that of a dome.

2. The round top of any structure, as of a furnace; the structure itself. See cupola-furnace. Specifically—3. Mkt., a revolving shot-proof turret, formed of strong timbers, and armored with massive iron plates. In some systems of cupolas the tower is erected on a base which is made to turn on its center by means of steam-power. Within the turret heavy ordnance is placed, and fired through openings in the sides. Farver, Mil. Encyc.

4. In anat.: (a) The summit of the cochlea.

(b) The summit of an intestinal gland. Fry.

—5. In conch., the so-called dorsal or visceral hump, made by the heap of viscera.

Cupolad (kū'pō-lād), a. [Cupola + -ad.] Having a cupola.

Here is also another rich ebony cabinet cupola'd with a tortoise-shell.

Swain, Diary, Oct. 22, 1664.

Now hast thou chang'd thy paint; and made Thyself a faun that a cupola'd.

Locke, Lucasta.

Cupola-furnace (kū'pō-lā-fēr'nās), n. In metal., a shaft-furnace built more slightly than the ordinary blast-furnace, and usually of fire-brick, hooped or cased with iron. It is chiefly used for remelting cast-iron for foundry purposes.

Cupolated (kū'pō-lā-ted), a. [Cupola + -at + -ed.] Having a cupola.

They show'd us Virgil's sepulchre erected on a steep rock, in forme of a small rotunda or cupolated column.

Swain, Diary, Feb. 7, 1665.

Cuppa (kup'pā), n. [ML., a cup: see cup.] A cup; specifically, ecoles, the bowl or cup of a chalice or of a ciborium.

Cupped (kupt), a. [Cup + -ed.] Depressed at the center like a cup; dished; cup-shaped.

In the original machine (type-writer) the keys were of bone, slightly cupped, with letters in relief, so that the blind could use it.

Sci. Amer., N. Y., LVI 276.

Cupper (kup'ēr), n. 1. One who carries a cup; a cup-bearer.—2. One who applies a cupping-glass.

Cupping (kup'ing), n. [Verbal n. of cup, v.] 1. In surg., the application of the cupping-glass. There are two modes of cupping: one in which the part is scarified and some blood taken away to relieve congestion or inflammation of internal parts, called wet cupping, or more generally simply cupping; and a second, termed dry cupping, in which there is no scarification and no blood is abstracted.

2. A concavity in the end of a cylindrical casting, produced by the shrinkage of the metal.—3. A shallow counter-sink.

Cupping-glass (kup'ing-glas), n. A glass vessel like a cup applied to the skin in the operation of cupping. The air within is rarefied by heat or otherwise, so that when applied to the skin a partial vacuum is produced, and the part to which it is applied swells up into the glass. Where the object is blood-letting there is inside the cupping-glass an apparatus called a scarificator, furnished with fine lancets operated by a spring or trigger, by which the skin is cut, or the skin is cut by similar instrument before the cupping-glass is used. Various forms of cupping-instruments are used.

Still at their books, they will not be pull'd off; They stick like cupping glasses.

Fletcher (and others), Bloody Brother, iv. 2.

Cupping-house (kup'ing-hous), n. [< cupping, verbal n. (with reference to the cup that inebriates), + house.] A tavern.

How many of these madmen lavish out their short times in . . . playing, dicing, drinking, feasting, boasting; a cupping-house, a vaulting-house, a gaming-house, share their means, lives, souls.

Rex T. Adams, Works, I. 377.

Cupping-machine (kup'ing-mā-shēn), n. The first machine used in the process of making metallic cartridge-cases. It consists of two stamps or dies, one working within the other. The outer one cuts the copper blank and the next pulls it into the shape of a cup, preparing it for drawing in other machines.

Cupping-tool (kup'ing-tōl), n. A cup-shaped blacksmith's swage.

Cup-plant (kup'plant), n. The Silphium perfoliatum, a tall, stout composite of the United States, with a square stem and large opposite leaves, the upper pairs connate at the base and forming a cup-like cavity. The flowers are large and yellow.

Cupples (kup'pils), n. pl. In her., bar-gemel. See gemel.

Cup-purse (kup'pērs), n. A long netted purse one of both ends of which are wrought upon a cup-formed mold to give it shape.

Cuppy (kup'i), n. [Appar. < F. coupe, cut: see coupe.] In her., one of the furs composed of patches like potent, but arranged so that each is set against a patch of the same tincture, instead of alternated. It is always argent and azure unless otherwise blazoned. Also called potent counter-potent.

Cuprate (kū'prāt), n. [< cupr (ic) + -ate.] A salt of cupric acid.

Cuprea-bark (kū'prē-ē-bārk), n. [< L. cuprea, coppery (< cuprum, copper), + bark.] The bark of Remyia Parviana and R. pedunculata, trees of tropical South America, allied to Cinchona. It is of a copper-red color, and yields quinine and allied alkaloids.

Cupreine (kū'prē-in), n. [< cuprea (bark) + -ine.] An alkaloid obtained from the double alkaloid homocoumarin, found in a variety of cuprea-bark, the product of Remyia pedunculata.

Cupreous (kū'prē-us), a. [< L. cupreus, of copper, < cuprum, copper: see copper.] 1. Consisting of or containing copper; having the properties of copper.—2. Copper-colored; reddish-brown with a metallic luster.

I got a rare mass of golden and silver and bright cupreous flakes, which looked like a string of jewels.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 232.

Cupreous luster. See luster.

Cupressine (kū'pro-sin'ē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Cupressus + -in + -ae.] A suborder of Conifera, of which the genus Cupressus is the type, with opposite or ternate, mostly scale-like, and adnate leaves. It includes also the genera Juniperus, Chamaecyparis, Thuja, Labocedrus, Taxodium, and others of the old world.

Cupressites (kū'pro-si'tēz), n. [NL., < Cupressus, q. v.] A genus of fossil plants considered to be closely allied to, if not identical with, the recent genus Cupressus (which see). This genus is one of those found in connection with amber, and in various later geological formations, especially the lignitic group of northern Germany. The forms found in the Permian and so characteristic of a part of that group, and which were formerly referred to Cupressites, are now put in the genus Ulmacites.

Cupressocrinidae (kū'pres-ē-krin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cupressocrinus + -idae.] A family of fossil crinoids or encrinites, named from the genus Cupressocrinus, having a cup-shaped calyx, ranging from the Devonian to the Carboniferous formation.

Cupressocrinite (kū'pres-sok'ri-nit), n. [As Cupressocrinus + -ite.] An encrinite of the genus Cupressocrinus.

Cupressocrinus (kū'pres-sok'ri-nus), n. [NL., < L. cupressus, cypress, + Gr. κρῖν, illy.] A genus of encrinites.

Cupressus (kū'pres-us), n. [NL., < L. cupressus, rarely cupressus, in L. cupressus: see cupress.] A genus of coniferous trees having small, scale-like, appressed or spreading acute leaves, as in the junipers, and cones formed of a small number of peltate woody scales, with several small angular seeds to each scale; the cypress. The common cypress of the old world is C. sempervirens, a native of the East.

The tree with erect appressed branches, having a slender pyramidal form, frequently planted in Mohammedan and other burying grounds, is a variety of this species, besides which there are three or four others in the Mediterranean region and central Asia. In North America there are seven or eight species, in Mexico, Arizona, and California. The wood is fragrant, compact, and durable.

Cone of Cypress (Cupressus)

cupric (kū'prīk), a. [< L. cuprum, copper, + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of copper; derived from copper: as, cupric acid. Also cuprous.—Cupric compound, a compound into which the atom of copper enters with equivalence of two for example, CuO, cupric oxide. In a cuprous compound two atoms of copper enter, forming a bivalent group: for example, Cu<sub>2</sub>O, cuprous oxide.

cupuliferous (kū-pū-līf'ē-rus), a. [< L. cuprum, copper, + L. ferre, = E. bear, + -ous.] Producing or containing copper; copper-bearing: as, cupuliferous ore, or silver.

cuprite (kū'prīt), n. [< L. cuprum, copper, + -ite.] The red oxide of copper; red copper ore; a common ore of copper, of a bright-red color, occurring in isometric crystals (cubes, octahedrons, etc.), and also massive. It is sometimes found in capillary forms, as in the variety chalcotrichite.

cupro-ammonium (kū'prō-a-mō'ni-um), n. Same as copperized ammonia (which see, under copper).

cuproid (kū'proid), n. [< L. cuprum, copper, + Gr. eidos, form.] In crystal, a solid related to a tetrahedron, and contained under twelve equal triangles. It is the hemihedral form of the tetragonal trisectahedron or trapezohedron.

cupromagnetite (kū-prō-mag'ne-sīt), n. [< L. cuprum, copper, + ML. magnesum, q. v., + -ite.] A hydrous sulphate of copper and magnesium.

cuproscheelite (kū-prō-shē'līt), n. [< L. cuprum, copper, + scheelite.] A variety of scheelite containing several per cent. of copper oxide.

cuprose (kū'prōs), n. [< L. cuprum, copper, + -ose.] Same as copper-rose.

cuprous (kū'prūs), a. [< L. cuprum, copper, + -ous.] Same as cupric.

cupseed (kū'pēd), n. A tall, climbing, menispermaceous vine of the southern United States, Calyocarpum Lyons, with large lobed, cordate leaves and small greenish-white flowers. The fruit is a large drupe containing a bony seed hollowed out on one side like a cup.

cup-shaped (kū'pshāpt), a. Shaped like a cup.—Cup-shaped organs, specifically, in some Hirudinea, bundles of tactile setae embedded in depressions of the integument of the head and body.

cup-shrimp (kū'pshrimp), n. A shrimp, Palaeomonas vulgaris, when so small as to be sold by measure, not by counting. [Local, British.] cup-sponge (kū'psūnj), n. A kind of commercial sponge. The Turkey cup-sponge is Spongia adriatica, also called Levant toilet-sponge.

cupula (kū'pū-lā), n.; pl. cupulae (-lā). [NL., a little cup, etc., dim. of ML. cupa, a cup: see cupola and cup.] Same as cupola.

cupular (kū'pū-lār), a. [< cupula + -ar.] Cup-shaped; resembling a small cup.

cupulate (kū'pū-lāt), a. [< NL. cupulatus, < cupula, q. v.] Same as cupular.

cupule (kū'pūll), n. [< NL. cupula, q. v.] 1. A small cup-shaped depression, as in rock.

These cupules have not only various sizes in different stones, but even in the same stone differ considerably from one surface to another. Esqu. Brit., XVI. 113

2. In bot.: (a) A form of involucre, occurring in the oak, beech, chestnut, and hazel, consisting of bracts which in fruit cohere into a kind of cup.

(b) In fungi, a receptacle shaped like the cup of an acorn, as in Persea.—

3. In entom., a little cup-shaped organ; specifically, one of the sucking-disks on the lower surface of the tarsi of certain aquatic beetles.

Also cupula.

Cupulifer (kū-pū-līf'ē-rē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (see L. plantae, plants) of cupuliferus: see

Cupule
a, cupule of acorn; A, cupule of fungus (Peziza)

cupuliferous.] An important order of apetalous exogenous trees, including the oak, chestnut, beech, birch, etc. It is characterized by monocious flowers, of which the staminate are in aments and the pistillate have an inferior or naked 2- to 6-celled ovary, the cells having one or two ovules. The order is divided into three tribes, each of which has been ranked as a distinct order: viz., Quercaceae (the Cupuliferus of many authors), which have the fruit surrounded or inclosed in a scaly or spinly involucre or cup, as in the oak, chestnut, and beech; Corylaceae, with the bracts of the involucre foliaceous and more or less united, as in the hazel and hornbeam; and Betulaceae, which have the scale-like bracts imbricate in a spike and the nutlets small and flattened, as in the birch and alder. The 10 genera include about 400 species, distributed over the temperate regions of the northern hemisphere.

cupuliferous (kū-pū-līf'ē-rus), a. [< NL. cupuliferus, < cupula, q. v., + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., bearing cupules.

cupuliform (kū'pū-līf'ōrm), a. [< NL. cupula, q. v., + L. forma, shape.] Shaped like or resembling a cupule; cupular.

cup-valve (kū'pvalv), n. 1. A cup-shaped or conical valve which is guided by a stem to and from its flaring seat.—2. A valve placed like an inverted cup over an opening.—3. A form of balance-valve which opens simultaneously at the sides and top. E. H. Knight.

(def 1)

cur (kūr), n. [< ME. kur, curre; of LG. or Scand. origin: = MD. korre, a house-dog, watch-dog; = Sw. dial. kurre, a dog. Prob. so called from his growling; cf. *MD. *korren*, in comp. korrepot, equiv. to D. knorrepot (= Dan. knurrepotte), a grumbler, snarler (cf. MD. D. knorren = G. knurren = Dan. knurre, grumble, snarl); = Isel. kurra, grumble, murmur; = Sw. kurra, croak, rumble; = Dan. kurre, ooo, whirr; cf. E. dial. curr, cry as an owl, Sc. curr, ooo as a dove, purr as a cat, curdoo, curdoo, curroo, ooo as a dove, currie-currie, expressive of a noisy habitual growl. An imitative word: see curr, and cf. churr, churr, hurr, whurr.] 1. A dog; usually in deprecation, a snarling, worthless, or outcast dog; a dog of low or degenerate breed.

They, . . . like to village cur,
Bark when their fellows do. Shak., Hen VIII., II. 4

Hang, hair, like hemp, or like the laling cur;
Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, IV. 1

Both mongrel, puppy, whelp, and hound,
And curs of low degree.
Goldsmith, Elegy on the Death of a Mad Dog

2. Figuratively, a surly, ill-bred man; a low, despicable, ill-natured fellow: used in contempt.

What would you have, you cur,
That like nor peace nor war? Shak., Cor., I. 1

curability (kūr'ā-bil'itē), n. [= F. curabilité = It. curabilità, < L. as if **curabilis* (t)-s, < curabilis: see curable.] The character of being curable; the fact of admitting of cure.

curable (kūr'ā-bl), a. [= F. curable = Pr. Sp. curable = Pg. curavel = It. curabile, < L. curabilis, < L. curare, cure: see cure, v.] 1. Capable of being healed or cured; admitting a remedy: as, a curable disease or patient; a curable evil.

There be some Distempers of the Mind that proceed from those of the Body, and so are curable by Drugs and Diets. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 18

2. Capable of curing.

A curable virtue against all diseases. Sandys, Travels, III. 174

curableness (kūr'ā-bl-nēs), n. Capability of being cured, healed, or remedied; curability.

The arguments which Helmont and others draw from the providence of God, for the curableness of all diseases. Boyle, Works, II. 110.

curacao (kū-ra-sō'), n. [So named from the island of Curacao, north of Venezuela. See curasow.] A cordial made of spirit sweetened and flavored with the peel of the bitter orange. Commonly written curacao.

curacao-bird (kū-ra-sō'berd), n. An old name of the Guianan curasow or mituporanga, Oras alector; the crested curasow. Browne; Brisson, 1780.

curacao, n. Incorrect spelling of curacao.

curacy (kū'ra-sē), n.; pl. curacies (-sēs). [< curate + -cy; as if *< NL. *curacia*.] 1. The office or employment of a curate.

They get into orders as soon as they can, and if they be very fortunate, arrive in time to a curacy here in town. Swift.

2. The condition or office of a curate; guardianship.

By way of curacy and protectorship. Super North, Examen, p. 200.

Perpetual curacy. See perpetual curate, under curate.

curari, curara (kū-rā'ri, -rē), n. [< S. Amer., also written curare, and in many variant forms, curari, curari, woorara, woorak, woorak, woorak, woorak, etc.] A brown-black, shining, brittle, resinous substance, consisting of the aqueous extract of Strychnos toxicaria, and various other species of the same genus, used by South American Indians for poisoning their arrows, especially the small arrows shot from the blow-gun. Curari may, except in very large doses, be introduced with impunity into the alimentary canal; but if introduced into a puncture of the skin as so to mix with the blood, the effect is instantly fatal. Its principal effect is paralysis of the terminations of the motor nerves, and it causes death by paralysis of the muscles of the chest, producing suffocation. The chief use of curari by the Indians is for the chase, animals killed by it being quite wholesome. It is largely used in physiological experiments, and to a small extent therapeutically in spasmodic affections, as tetanus, rabies, etc.

curarine (kū-rā'rin), n. [< curari + -ine.] An alkaloid extracted from curari, forming colorless prisms more poisonous than the curari which yields it. One hundredth of a gram introduced into the skin of a rabbit produces death in a short time.

curarization (kū-rā-ri-sā'ahōn), n. [< curaries + -ation.] The act or operation of curarizing; the state of being curarized.

curarise (kū-rā'riz), v. t.; pret. and pp. curarized, ppr. curarizing. [< curari + -ize.] To administer curari to; destroy the motor without destroying the sensory function of the nervous system by the use of curari, as in vivisection, when the animal is rendered motionless and voiceless, but not insensible to pain.

curasow (kū-rasō'), n. [< curacao (bird): see curacao.] 1. One of the large gallinaceous South American birds of the genera Crax and Pauxi, and the subfamily Cracinae. There are in all upward of 12 species. The best-known, and that to which the name was first applied, is the curasow bird or crested curasow, Crax alector, of a greenish-black color with a white crest, inhabiting northern parts of South America. The red curasow is Crax rubra, the galeated curasow or curaw-bird is Pauxi galeata; the red-knobbed curasow is Crax (Oreoscoptes) curacaoensis or parvula. The glibose curasow, C. glibosura, is notable as the northernmost species, and the only one found north of Panama; it ranges into Mexico. Several species of curasows are domesticated in their native country, and resemble the turkey in size and general character.

2. pl. The family Cracinae.

Also spelled curasow, curasow, and also called hoco, mituporanga, and by other names.

curate, n. See curate.

curate, n. [< curate, curist, appar. based on ML. curata, a curasow: see curasow, and cf. OF. curret, undressed leather, from same ult. source.] A curasow.

Enchanting on their curates with my blade,
That none so fair as fair Angelica. Greene, Orlando Furioso.

The mastiff force that hunt the bristled bear
Are harnessed with curates light and strong. John Denys (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 179).

curate (kū'rāt), n. [< ME. curat = OFries. herit, < ML. curatus (> It. curato = F. curé), a priest, curate, prop. adj., having to do with the cure of souls, < L. cura, cure, care: see cure, n.] 1. According to former use, one who has the cure of souls; a priest; a minister.

When thou shalt be shaven of thy curat, tell him all all the sinners that thou hast done with thee were late survive. Chaucer, Priores Tale.

Set down upon my knees, and Curate, and all Congregations assembled to their charge, the heavenly Spirit of thy grace.

Book of Common Prayer (Eng.), Prayer for Clergy and People.

The various kinds of benedict parochial clergy, such as rectors, vicars, and all other persons who are now styled in common parlance incumbents, and who in old times were generally known as curates, from their having cure of souls.

J. C. Jefferies, Book about the Clergy, I. 43.

2. In the Church of England, and in the Irish Roman Catholic Church, a clergyman employed under the incumbent (whether rector or vicar), either as assistant in the same church or in a chapel within the parish and connected with the church. The curate is the priest of lowest degree in the Church of England, he must be licensed by the bishop or ordinary. The term is now in use in the United States.

3. A guardian; a protector.—Perpetual curate, in Eng. eccles. law, formerly, a curate of a parish in which there was neither rector nor vicar, and the benefice of which was in possession and control of a layman. Perpetual curates have since 1808 been abolished, every incumbent of a church (not a rector) who is entitled to perform marriages, etc., and to appropriate the fees, being now deemed a vicar and his benefice a vicarage.—Superior curate, in the Church of England, a curate who is hired by the rector or vicar to serve for him, and may be removed at pleasure.

curate, n. See curate.

curatelle (kū-rā-tel'), n. [F., < ML. curatus, care, < L. curare, care: see cure, v.] In French law, guardianship; co-guardianship; tutelage. curatelle (kū-rā-tel'), n. Same as curatelle, l. curatelle (kū-rā-tel'), n. [curare + -ess.] The wife of a curate. [Rare.]

A very lowly curate I might perhaps essay to rule, but a curate would be sure to get the better of me. Troilope, Barchester Towers, xxi.

curatist, n. [a. F. curatist = Sp. curatista = Pg. curatido = It. curatone, < L. curatio (n-), cure, healing, < curare, pp. curatus, take care, cure: see cure, v.] Cure; healing.

But I may not endure that thou dwell in so unskilful an opynion, That of thy wo is no curatist. Chaucer, Troilus, I. 701.

The method of curatist lately delivered by David Bach-harns was approved by the profession of Leyden. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

curative (kū-rā-tiv), a. and n. [a. F. curatif = Sp. Pg. It. curativo, < L. as if curativus, < curare, pp. curatus, cure: see cure, v.] 1. Relating to the cure of diseases.—2. Promoting cure; having the power or a tendency to cure.

II. n. That which cures or serves to cure; a remedy.

curatively (kū-rā-tiv-ly), adv. In a curative manner; as a curative.

curator (kū-rā-tor), n. [a. F. curateur = Pr. Sp. Pg. curador = It. curatore, < L. curator, one who has care of a thing, a manager, guardian, trustee, < curare, pp. curatus, take care of: see cure, v.] 1. In Rom. law, one appointed to manage the affairs of a person past the age of puberty when from any cause he has become unable to manage them himself.—2. In civil law, a guardian; specifically, one who has the care of the estate of a minor or other incompetent person.—3. One who has the care and superintendence of something, as of a public museum, the art collection, or the like.

Seeing the above-mentioned strangers are like to con-tinue here yet awhile, at the least some of them, the soci-ety shall much stand in need of a curator of experiments. Boyle, Works, VI. 147.

curatorship (kū-rā-tor-ship), n. [curator + -ship.] The office of a curator.

curatory (kū-rā-tō-ri), n. [curator, < L. curator, a curator.] In Rom. law, the office of a curator; curatorship; tutelage.

The curatory of minors about popularity was of much later date than the Tutelage. Boyle, Works, IX. 359.

curatrix (kū-rā-triks), n. [L., fem. of curator, < curare, pp. curatus, cure: see cure, v.] 1. A woman, or anything regarded as feminine, that cures or heals. [Rare.]

That "nature" of Hippocrates that is the curatrix of diseases. Overton, Intellectual System, p. 157.

2. A female superintendent or guardian. Richardson.

curb (kərb), a. and n. 1. [a. < ME. curbe, adj., < OF. curbe, curbe, mod. F. curbe = Pr. corb = Sp. Pg. curb (kərb), n. 1. [In some senses formerly also kerb; < curb, v.] 1. That which checks, restrains, or holds back; restraint; check; control.

This is a defence to the adjoining country, a safe guard and a curb to the city. Sauvage, Traveller, p. 198.

Wild natures need wise curbs. Tennyson, Princess, v.

Specifically—2. A chain or strap attached to the upper ends of the branches of the bit of a bridle, and passing under the horse's lower jaw, used chiefly in controlling an unruly or high-spirited horse. The curb rein is attached to the lower ends of the snaffle, and when it is pulled the curb is pressed forward against the horse's jaw with a tendency to break it if the pressure is great. See curb under harness.

He that before ran in the pastures wild Felt the stiff curb control his angry jaws. Drayton, Eclogues, IV.

To stop the mouths of our adversaries, and to bridle them with their own curb. Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

3. A line of joined stones set upright at the outer edge of a walk, or at one of the edges of a street or road, forming the inner side of a gutter; a row of curbstones. [In this and related uses formerly also spelled kerb.]—4. In arch.: (a) A breast-wall or retaining-wall erected to support a bank of earth. (b) A casing of stone, wood, brick, or iron, built inside a wall that is being sunk, or the framework above and around a well. (c) A boarded structure used to contain concrete until it hardens into a pier or foundation. (d) The outer casing of a turbine-wheel. (e) A curved shrouding which confines the water against the floats or buckets of a scoop-wheel or breast-wheel. (f) The wall-plate at the springing of a dome. (g) The wall-plate on the top of the permanent part of a windmill, on which the cap rotates as the wind veers. (h) An inclined circular plate placed round the edge of a kettle to prevent the contents from boiling over.

curba (kərb), n. An African measure of capacity, ranging at different places from 7½ to 15 gallons, used by the negroes in the sale of palm-oil, grain, pulse, etc. It may be a tub, a basket, or an earthen pot.

curbable (kərb-ə-bl), a. [a. < F. curvable; as curb + -able.] Capable of being curbed or restrained. [Rare.]

curb-bit (kərb-bit), n. A form of bit for the bridle of a horse, which, by the exertion of slight effort, can be made to produce great pressure on the mouth, and thus control the animal. See curb, n. 2.

curb-chain (kərb-čhān), n. A chain used as a check upon the motion of any moving piece of apparatus.

curb-key (kərb-ke), n. In teleg., a peculiar key used in operating submarine cables, designed to prevent the prolongation and confusion of signals growing out of induction.

curbously, n. Same as curb-bowill. Gosse, Millitary Antiquities.

curb-pin (kərb-pin), n. One of the pins on the lever of the regulator of a watch which embrace the hair-spring of the balance and regulate its vibrations. E. H. Knight.

curb-plate (kərb-plāt), n. 1. In arch.: (a) The wall-plate of a circular or elliptical dome or roof. E. H. Knight. (b) In a curb-roof, the plate which receives the feet of the upper rafters. (c) The plate of a skylight.—2. The cylindrical frame of a well; a well-curb. See curb, n. 2, 4 (b).

curb-roof (kərb-rūf), n. In arch., a roof in which the rafters, instead of continuing straight down from the ridge to the walls, are received at a given height on plates, which in their turn are supported by rafters less inclined to the horizon, whose bearing is directly on the walls. The roof thus presents a bent appearance, whence its name. The Mansard roof is a form of curb roof in which the slope of the lower section usually approaches the perpendicular, while that of the upper section approaches the horizontal, the angle between the two sections thus being strongly marked.

curb-sender (kərb-sen-der), n. An automatic signaling apparatus invented by Sir W. Thomson of Glasgow and Prof. Fleeming Jenkin of Edinburgh, used in submarine telegraphy. The message is punched on a paper ribbon, which is then passed through the transmitting apparatus by clockwork. The name is due to the fact that when a current of one kind of electricity is sent by the instrument, another of the opposite kind is sent immediately after to curb the effect of the second transmission being to make the indication produced by the first sharp and distinct, instead of slow and uncertain.

curbstones (kərb-stōn), n. 1. A stone placed against earth or brick- or stonework to prevent it from falling out or spreading.—2. Specifically, one of the stones set together on edge at the outer side of a sidewalk, forming a curb.

Curculio (kərb-kū-li-ō), n. [NL., < L. curculio, also gurgulo, a corn-worm, a weevil.] 1. A Linnean genus of weevils or snout-beetles, formerly conterminous with the Curculionidae, now greatly restricted or disjunct.—2. [a. < L. curculio, particularly, one of the common fruit-weevils which work great destruction among plums, and which receive the colloquial name "little Turk" from the crescent-shaped mark left by their sting. See cut under Conotrachelus. curculionid (kərb-kū-li-on-id), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Curculionidae.

The American agriculturist may have to encounter still another enemy of his labors—a curculionid beetle—the Phytonomus punctatus Smithsonian Report, 1891, p. 449.

II. n. A weevil or snout-beetle of the family Curculionidae (kərb-kū-li-on-id), n. pl. [NL., < Curculio (n-) + -idae.] A family of rhynchophorous Coleoptera or beetles; the weevils or snout-beetles, one of the most extensive groups of coleopterous insects. They have a strong fold on the inner face of each of the elytra, the pygidium divided in the males, the tarsi generally dilated, brush-like beneath, and no accessory mandibular piece. There are over 1,500 genera, all found on plants. About 10,000 species are described, in all of which the head is prolonged into a beak or snout, and furnished at the tip with a minute pair of sharp horizontal jaws which are used by the insect in depositing its eggs, generally in the kernel of some fruit. See cuts under Anthonomus, bean-beetle, and Conotrachelus.

curcuma (kôr'kû-mâ), n. [= It. and F. curcuma (NL. curcuma), < Ar. kurkum, saffron. See crocus.] 1. A plant of the genus Curcuma.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of plants, natural order Scitamineae. They have perennial tuberculous roots and annual stems, and the flowers are in spikes with concave bracts. Some with bright-colored reddish or yellow flowers are found in hothouses. Curcuma furnishes the saffron of the shops. The colored roots of C. angustifolia and C. leucorrhiza furnish a kind of starch sometimes called East Indian arrowroot. The root of C. amada (manug-ginger), a native of Bengal, is used in the same way as ginger. C. longa yields turmeric, a mildly aromatic substance, employed medicinally in India, and forming an ingredient in the composition of curry powder.

The ringing of a bell at an early hour (originally 8 o'clock) in the evening, as a signal to the inhabitants of a town or village to extinguish their fires and lights; the time of ringing the bell; the bell so rung, or its sound. This was a very common police regulation during the middle ages, as a protection against fires as well as against nocturnal disorders in the unlighted streets. The practice is commonly said to have been introduced into England from the continent by William the Conqueror, but it probably existed there before his time. The curfew-bell is still rung at 9 o'clock in some places, though it is several centuries since it was required by law.

Abouts curfew tyme or litel more.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 450.

He begins at curfew, and walks till the first cock.

Shak., Learn, iii. 4.

curia (kûr'i-â), n.; pl. curiae (-â). [L.; senses 2 and 3 first in ML.] 1. In Rom. antiq.: (a) One of the divisions of the citizens of Rome, with reference to locality. The number of the curiae is given as thirty, but the original number was smaller.

The Curia was a political and not a Gentile arrangement. . . . For the special relation of the Curia to the Curia, a hint is found in the statement that Romulus gave each Curia one allotment.

W. H. Harris, Aryan Household, p. 234.

(b) The building in which a curia met for worship or public deliberation. (c) The building in which the senate held its deliberations. (d) A title given to the senate of any one of the Italian cities, as distinguished from the Roman senate. — 2. In medieval legal use, a court, either judicial, administrative, or legislative; a court of justice. In the Norman period of English history the Curia Regia was an assembly which the king was bound to consult on important state matters, and whose consent was necessary for the enactment of laws, the imposition of extraordinary taxes, etc. It consisted nominally of the tenants in chief, but practically it was much more limited. Originally the Curia Regia and the Exchequer were composed of the same persons. From the Curia Regia there developed later the Ordinary Council or Privy Council, and the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas. Also Aula Regia or Regia.

The council, as it existed in the Norman period under the name of curia regis, exercised judicial, legislative, and administrative functions.

Encyc. Brit., XIX. 765.

3. [cap.] Specifically, in modern use, the court of the papal see.

The collusion, so to call it, between the crown and the papacy, as to the observance of the statute of provisions, extended also to the other dealings with the Curia.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 403.

Curia advisari vult, the court wishes to deliberate. It implies a postponement of decision after argument, and hence an adjournment or continuance of a cause pending consideration of what judgment should be resolved on. Abbreviated cur. adv. vult. — Curia claudenda, in early Eng. law, a writ requiring the making of a boundary-wall or fence.

curial (kū'ri-əl), a. [= F. Sp. Pg. curial = It. curiale, < L. curialis, of the curia, M.L. of a court, < curia, curia, M.L. a court; see curia.] 1. Of or pertaining to the Roman curia; as, "curial festivals," Encyc. Brit., XX. 732. — 2. Pertaining or relating to the Papal Curia.

curialism (kū'ri-əl-izm), n. [Curial + -ism.] The political system or policy of the Papal Curia or court.

The ancient principles of popular election and control . . . have by the constant aggressions of Curialism been in the main effaced.

Gladstone, Vaticanism, Harper's Weekly, Supp., XIX. 251.

curialistic (kū'ri-əl-ist'ik), a. [As curial-ism + -istic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of curialism.

curiality (kū'ri-əl'i-ti), n. [Curial + -ity, in sense of 'courtly,' < curialis, of a court; see curial.] The privileges, prerogatives, or retinue of a court.

The court and curiality. Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

4. Fluency; readiness of utterance. [Rare or obsolete.]—5. General estimation; the rate at which anything is generally valued.

He . . . takes greatness of kingdoms according to their bulk and currency, and not after intrinsic value. Bacon.

6. That which is current as a medium of exchange; that which is in general use as money or as a representative of value: as, the currency of a country.

It thus appears, that a depreciation of the currency does not affect the foreign trade of the country: this is carried on precisely as if the currency maintained its value. J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., III, xxii, § 3.

Controller of the currency. See controller, 2.—Decimal currency, a system of money the divisions or denominations of which proceed from its lowest unit of reckoning by ten or its multiples, or aliquot parts thereof, as the cent, dime, dollar, quarter-dollar, etc., of the United States and Canada.—Fractional currency, coins or paper money of a smaller denomination than the monetary unit; in the United States, half-dollars, quarters, dimes, and 6 cent, 3-cent, 2-cent, and 1-cent pieces. Fractional currency in paper has been largely used in several European countries, and is a part of the monetary system of Japan. Fractional notes have been used at different times in the United States, especially during the financial panic of 1837 '38, and during and after the civil war of 1861-65, when specie was withdrawn from circulation. The former received the name of shinplasters. (See shinplaster.) On March 17th, 1869, Congress authorized an issue of circulating notes called postage currency, imitating in style the stamps that had previously been used at great inconvenience, in denominations of 5, 10, 25, and 50 cents. These were superseded by the fractional currency authorized March 3d, 1869, in denominations of 5, 10, 15, 25, and 50 cents. The issue of fractional notes was suspended by act of April 17th, 1876; but its renewal has since been proposed for convenience in remittance of small sums.—Metallic currency, the gold, silver, and copper in circulation as money.—National currency Act, statutes of the United States of 1863, 1864, and 1865, providing for a general and uniform bank-note currency guaranteed by the United States and secured by national bonds deposited in the Treasury.—Paper currency, notes issued by a government or by banks as a substitute for money, or as a representative of money. The paper currency of the United States is of three kinds: (1) notes issued by the government and called demoted treasury notes, or more generally legal-tenders; (2) notes issued by national banks, and (3) certificates issued by the government upon either gold or silver. The smallest denomination of the first is $20 and of the last $1.—Postage currency, See fractional currency, above.—The currency principle, a phrase first employed in English banking to express the mode of issuing notes by the Bank of England. An amount fixed by law is issued, based on an equal amount of securities, mostly government obligations; and all notes issued in excess of that amount, which is called "the fixed issue," are based on an equal amount of specie.

current (kur'ent), a. and n. [Now spelled to suit the Latin; early mod. E. also currant, currant, currant, < ME. currant, currant, < OF. current, courant, F. courant = Sp. corriente = Pg. Hence—2. Passing from one to another; especially, widely circulated; publicly known, believed, or reported; common; general; prevalent: as, the current ideas of the day.

The news is current now, they mean to leave you, Leave their allegiance. Fletcher, Loyal Subject, v. 1.

As soon as an emperor had done anything remarkable, it was immediately stamped on a coin, and became current through his whole dominions. Addison, Ancient Medals, III.

When belief in the spirits of the dead becomes current, the medicine-man, professing ability to control them, and inspiring faith in his pretensions, is regarded with a fear which prompts obedience. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 474.

3. Passing from hand to hand; circulating: as, current coin.

He ordained that the Money of his Father, though counted base by the People, should be current. Baker, Chronicles, p. 112.

4. Established by common estimation or consent; generally received: as, the current value of coin.—5. Entitled to credit or recognition; fitted for general acceptance or circulation; authentic; genuine.

Thou canst make No excuse current, but to hang thyself Shak., Rich III, I, 2

6. Now passing; present in its course: as, the current month or year. [In such expressions as eth current (or curr.), current is really an adjective, the expression being short for eth day of the current month.] Account current. See account. Current coin. See coin.—Current electricity. See electricity.—To go current, to go for current; to be or become generally known or believed.

A great while it went for current that it was a pleasant region. Purkiss, Pilgrimage, p. 12.

To pass current, to have currency or recognition; to be accepted as genuine, credible, or of full value: as, worn coins do not pass current at banks.

His manner would scarce have passed current in our day. Lamb, Artificial Comedy.

If a man is base metal, he may pass current with the old counterfeiters like himself; children will not touch him. T. Winkthrop, Cecil Dreams, iv.

II. n. 1. A flowing; a flow; a stream; a passing by a continuous flux: used of fluids, as water, air, etc., or of supposed fluids, as electricity.

Whose joy current and compulsive course Ne'er keeps retiring ebb. Shak., Othello, III, 2.

It is not the tears of our own eyes only, but of our friends also that do exhaust the current of our sorrows. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, II, 2.

2. Specifically, a portion of a large body of water or of air moving in a certain direction: as, ocean-currents. The set of a current is that point of the compass toward which the waters run; the drift of a current is the rate at which it runs. The principal ocean-currents are the Gulf Stream, the equatorial currents of the Atlantic, Pacific, and Indian oceans, and the Japanese, Peruvian, Brazilian, Labrador, Antarctic, and Australian currents.

3. Course in general; progressive movement or passage; connected series: as, the current of time.

Forbear me, sir, And trouble not the current of my day. Ford, Perkin Warbeck, v. 2.

4. General or main course; general tendency: as, the current of opinion.

Till we unite and join in the same common Current, we have little cause to hope for State of Peace and Tranquillity. Stillington, Sermons, III, 2.

5. The amount of depression given to a roof to cause the water which falls upon it to flow in a given direction.—Alternating current, an electric current which flows alternately in opposite directions without interruption.—A make-and-break current, an intermittent electric current in a circuit which is rapidly made and broken, as by the vibrations of a sonorous disk.—American currents. See amperian.—Atmospheric currents, movements of the air constituting winds, caused by regular or fortuitous disturbances of the atmosphere.

Cable-current, when a submarine cable is broken, a steady current through it, produced by the exposed copper wire forming a battery with the iron sheathing.—Current-mailing. See serif.—Currents of action, the electric currents developed in nerve or muscle by stimulation.—Currents of rest, the electrical currents which pass on connecting different points of an unstimulated piece of nerve or muscle.—Earth-current, a current flowing through a wire the extremities of which are grounded at points on the earth differing in electric potential. The earth current is due to this difference, which is generally temporary and often large. If the earth-plates of a circuit are of different metals, as copper and zinc, an earth-battery current is set up which is feeble and tolerably constant. Electric current, the passage of electricity through a conductor, as from one pole of a voltaic battery to the other—for example, in the telegraph. (See electricity.) A current is said to be intermittent when repeatedly interrupted, as by the breaking and making of the circuit, pulsatory when characterized by sudden changes of intensity, and undulatory when the intensity varies according to the same law as that governing the velocity of the air-particles in a sound-wave.—Faradaic current. See Faradaic.—Galvanic current, an electric current generated by a galvanic battery, as distinguished from an induced current, or a current produced by a dynamo or other electrical machine.—Induced current. See induction.—Interrupted current, an electric current the flow of which is completely arrested at frequently recurring intervals. It is generally produced by means of a rapidly vibrating armature, a rotating disk, or a similar device.—Inverse current, the current induced in the secondary coil of an induction apparatus when the circuit of the primary is closed. It is contrary to the primary current in direction.—Muscle-current, the electrical current which passes on connecting different points of a muscle.—Pulsary current, a system combining two or more alternating currents differing in phase.—Primary current, the electric current which passes through the primary coil of an induction apparatus, in the secondary

4. Condemnation; sentence of evil or punishment. [Archaic.]

Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law. Gal. III. 13.

O, my offence is rank, it smells to heaven;
It hath the primal eldest curse upon 't,
A brother's murder. Shak., Hamlet, III. 3.

Curse of Canaan, negro slavery; hence, in a satirical use, negro slaves collectively: in allusion to the curse pronounced by Noah upon Canaan, the son (or the descendants) of Ham (Gen. IX. 25, 26), negroes being formerly regarded by many as the descendants of Canaan, and their slavery being justified as an accomplishment of the curse.

Her thirds was part in cotton lands, part in the curse of Canaan. Lowell, Biglow Papers.

Curse of Scotland, the nine of diamonds in playing-cards: so called probably from the resemblance of that card to the heraldic bearings of the Earls of Mar, one of whom was detected in Scotland as the principal author (while Master of Stair) of the massacre of Glasgow (1695). Other explanations have been proposed.—The curse, in theol., the sentence pronounced upon Adam and Eve, and through them upon the human race (Gen. III. 16-19), in consequence of the sin of Adam, and its fulfilment in the history of mankind.—Syn. 1. Accusation, Anathema, etc. See malediction.—2. Scourge, plague, affliction, ruin.

curse (kərs), v.; pret. and pp. curst (sometimes curst), pp. curst. [ME. cursen, curson, corson, curse (intr., utter oath; trans., imprecate evil upon, put under ecclesiastical ban), < late AS. cursian (< corrian, in Benson and Lye, not authenticated), also in comp. forcurian (in pp. forcurst: see curst), curse; cf. curra, a curse: see curse, n. Cf. accurse.] I. trans. 1. To wish evil to; imprecate or invoke evil upon; call down calamity, injury, or destruction upon; execrate in speech.

Thou shalt not . . . curse the ruler of thy people. Ex. xxi. 24.

Curse me this people, for they are too mighty for me. Num. xxi. 6.

Couldst thou not curse him? I command thee curse him. Curse all the gods here, and deliver him. To thy just wishes. Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, I. i.
Your fair land shall be rent and torn,
Your people be of all fortunes.
And all men curse you for this thing.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 307.

Hence—2. To put under ecclesiastical ban or anathema; excommunicate; condemn or sentence to the disabilities of excommunication.

Overglanced the articles. [A doubtful reading.]
Shak., Rev. V., v. 2.

Cursores (kér'só-réz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. cursor, a runner: see cursor.] 1. In ornith.: (a) An order of birds, the struthious or ratite birds, corresponding to the Batite of Merrem (1813), or the Brevipennis of Cuvier (1817): so called from the swift-footedness of most of these flightless birds. (b) In Sundevall's system of classification, the fourth cohort of Grallatores, composed of the plovers, bustards, cranes, rails, and all other wading birds not included in his Limicola, Pelargi, or Herodi. Brevipennis is a synonym. (c) In Illiger's system (1811), the fifth order of birds, uniting the struthious with the charadriomorphie birds: divided into Proceri (the struthious birds), Campestris (the bustards alone), and Littorales (the plovers and plover-like birds).—2. In entom., a group of spiders, such as the wolf-spiders (Lycosidae), which make no webs, but capture their prey by swift pursuit. See Citigrada.

Cursoria (kér'só-rí-á), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. cursorius, pertaining to running: see cursor. Cf. Cursores.] 1. In Latreille's classification of insects, one of two prime divisions of Orthoptera (the other being Naltatoria), distinguished by their mode of progression, and by having tubular instead of vesicular tracheae. The division comprised the three leading types of Purpura, Blatta, and Mantis, being therefore equivalent to the modern Cursoria plus the Gremoria and Euphyroptera. 2. A suborder of Orthoptera, containing only the Blattida or cockroaches; the Dictyoptera of Leach. In this restricted use of Cursoria, introduced by Westwood, the remainder of Latreille's Cursoria are called Ambulatoria (the Phasmida) and Raptoria (the Mantodea).

cursorial (kér'só-rí-ál), a. [Cf. L.L. cursorius, pertaining to running (see cursor), + -ál.] 1. Fitted for running: as, the cursorial legs of a dog.—2. Having limbs adapted for walking or running, as distinguished from other modes of progression: as, a cursorial isopod; a cursorial orthopteran.—3. Habitually progressing by walking or running, as distinguished from hopping, leaping, etc.; gradient; gressorial; ambulatory. Specifically—4. Of or pertaining to the Cursoria, Cursores, or Cursitores.

Cursorinae (kér'só-rí-né), n. pl. [NL., < Cursorium + -inae.] A subfamily of plover-like birds, the cursors, exemplified by the genus Cursorius. Also Cursorinae. G. E. Gray, 1840.

cursorily (kér'só-rí-ly), adv. In a running or hasty manner; slightly; hastily; without close attention or thoroughness: as, I read the paper cursorily.

cursoriness (kér'só-rí-nés), n. The quality of being cursory; slightness or hastiness of view or examination.

cursorious (kér'só-rí-us), a. [Cf. L.L. cursorius, of or pertaining to running, < L. cursor, a runner: see cursor, cursor.] In entom., adapted for running.—Cursorious legs, legs of an insect in which the tarsal joints are somewhat elongate, and generally devoid of spongy cushions or setae. The phrase is mainly limited to coleopterous insects, as the Cursaria.

Cursorius (kér'só-rí-us), n. [NL. (Jatham, 1790), < L.L. cursorius, pertaining to running: see cursorious.] The typical genus of plover-like birds of the subfamily Cursorinae, the type of which is the cream-colored cursor, C. gallicus or inabellinus, of Africa and Europe; the cursors proper. There are several other species, chiefly African, as the black-bellied cursor (C. senegalensis), the brassy-winged cursor (C. chalcopertus), and the double-collared cursor (C. bipectus). Two Indian species are C. coromandicus and C. bitroquatus. The tail is nearly even; the tarsal are scutellate; there is no hind toe; and the nostrils are in a short fossa, not a long groove. The cursors are desert-birds, feed chiefly on insects, and lay rounded rather than pyriform eggs. The genus is also called Cursus, Tachydromus, Ilyas, Macrotarsus, Rhinoptilus, and Hemidromus.

cursor (kér'só-ri), a. [Cf. L.L. cursorius, of or pertaining to running or to a race-course, < L. cursor, a runner, racer: see cursor.] 1. Running about; not stationary. Their cursor men. Proceedings against Garnet, sig. F (1860). 2. In entom., adapted for running, as the feet of many terrestrial beetles; cursorial. [Itare.] —3. Hasty; slight; superficial; careless; not exercising or receiving close attention: as, a cursor reader; a cursor view. It is an advantage to all narrow wisdom and narrow morals, that their maxims have a plausible air, and, on a cursor view, appear equal to first principles. They are light and portable. Burke, Present Discontents. Truth or reality is not that which lies on the surface of things and can be perceived by every cursor observer. J. Caird.

Cursor bachelor, in medieval universities, a bachelor who was appointed to give cursor lectures. See bachelor, 2 (b). —Cursor lectures, in medieval universities, lectures which could be given by a bachelor. They consisted either in the reading of the text of the book forming the subject of the ordinary lectures of a given master, with explanations of the meaning, sentence by sentence, or in lectures upon subjects not included in the ordinary lectures, but authorized by the nation or superior faculty. —Syn. 3. Desultory, inattentive, passing.

cursor (kér'só), p. a. [Same as cursor (pron. as cursor), pp. of cursor, r.: used familiarly with sinking of its literal sense: see cursor. Cf. wicked and darned (in its colloquial profane use), which show a similar development of meaning.] 1. Shrewish; waspish; vixenish; ill-tempered: applied to women.

What is most trouble to man
Of all things that be lying?
A cursor wife shorteth his life.
Balcan Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 86.

She's a cursor queen, tell him, and plays the sword behind his back.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iv. 3.

Sp. Pg. It. cortina, a curtain, < ML. cortina, a small court,croft, curtain of a castle, a cloth screen, dim. of cortia, a court: see court, n.] 1. A hanging screen of a textile fabric (or rarely of leather) used to close an opening, as a doorway or an alcove, to shut out the light from a window, and for similar purposes. See blind, shade, portière, lambrquin; also altar-curtain and hanging.

Specifically—(a) The large sheet of stuff used to inclose and conceal the stage in a theater, and is usually attached to a roller by its loose extremity, and is withdrawn by rolling it up from below. (b) Hangings of stuff used at the windows of inhabited rooms: sometimes fixed at top, and capable of being looped up below; sometimes secured at top to rings which run on a rod, and therefore capable of being withdrawn toward the sides.

But I look'd, and round, all round the house I beheld
The death-white curtains drawn.
Knew that the death-white curtain meant but sleep.
Yet I shudder'd and thought like a fool of the sleep of death.
Templeton, Maud, xiv. 6.

(c) Hangings used to shut in or screen a bedstead.

Of curtyns of clene sylk, wyth oler golde hemmyn.
Mr. Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), i. 264.

Even such a man, so faint, so spiritless, . . .
Drew Priam's curtain in the dead of night,
And would have told him half his Troy was burn'd.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 1.

Hence—2. Whatever covers or conceals like a curtain or hangings.

When day, expiring in the west,
The curtain draws o' nature's rest.
Burns, Dainty Davie.

curvature (kér-vā-tür), n. [= Sp. It. curvatura = Pg. curvadura, < L. curvatura, < currere, pp. curratus, bend, curve: see curvate, curv, e.]

1. Continuous bending; the essential character of a curve: applied primarily to lines, but also to surfaces. See phrases below.

In a curve, the curvature is the angle through which the tangent sweeps round per unit of length of the curve.

A. Daniell, Prin. of Physic, p. 74.

2. Any curving or bending; a flexure.—3. Something which is curved or bent. Aberrancy of curvature. See aberrancy.—Absolute curvature of a twisted curve, in geom., the reciprocal of the radius of the osculating circle.—Angle of curvature. See angle.—Angular curvature of the spine, in pathol., abnormal and excessive curvature of the spine projecting backward, produced by caries of the bodies of the vertebrae, or Pott's disease. Also called Pott's curvature.—Anticlastic curvature, in geom., that kind of curvature which belongs to a surface cutting its tangent plane in four directions, as the inside part of an anchor-ring. Anticlastic curvature is also called hyperbolic curvature, because a surface so curved has a hyperbola for its indicatrix.—Average curvature, the whole curvature divid-quently no leaf can be exactly above any preceding one. The ordinary forms of phyllotaxy indicated by the fractions  $\frac{1}{2}$ ,  $\frac{2}{3}$ , etc., approximate more and more closely to this, and the deviation in the  $\frac{1}{2}$  and  $\frac{2}{3}$  arrangements is inappreciable. Such forms, therefore, are sometimes so designated.

curvital (kér'vī-tāl), a. [curve + -it- + -al.]

Pertaining to curves in general. — Curvital function, a function expressing the length of the perpendicular from a fixed point of a curve upon a normal at a variable point, the length of the arc from the fixed to the variable point being the independent variable of the function.

cushion (kush'un), v. [Cushion, n.] I. trans.

1. To seat on or as on a cushion or cushions.

Many, who are cushioned upon thrones, would have remained in obscurity. Bulwer-Luttrell, Parties

2. To cover or conceal with or as with a cushion; furnish with a cushion or cushions, in any sense of that word: as, to cushion a seat; to cushion a carriage.

Further gain was also made by cushioning the bearings of the diaphragm on both sides with rings of paper. G. B. Prescott, Elect. Invent., p. 24

3. To put aside or suppress.

The apothecary trotted into town, now in full possession of the vicar's motive for desiring to cushion his son's oratory. M. W. Deane, R. Medlicott, II. 10.

II. intrans. In billiards, to make the cue-ball hit the cushion, either before it touches any other ball or after contact with the object-ball.

cushion-capital (kush'un-kap'i-tāl), n. In arch., a capital of such form as to appear like a cushion pressed upon by the weight of the entablature.

It is of common occurrence in Indian buildings; and the name is specifically given to a form of Norman capital, consisting of a cubic round ed off at its lower angles.

cushion-carom (kush'un-kar'om), n. In billiards, a carom in which the cue-ball hits the cushion before striking the second object-ball.

cushion-dance (kush'un-dans), n. An English and Scotch dance, especially popular among country people and at weddings. It is a sort of circular gallopade in single file, in which, at a certain regularly recurring stage in the music, each dancer in turn drops a cushion before one of the other sex, the two having knelt and kissed each other, the promenade is resumed. In Scotland it is called bab at the bow-stick, or bab at the balster.

cushionet (kush'un-et), n. [Formerly also cushinet (= It. cuscinetto); as cushion + dim. -et.] A little cushion.

cushioning (kush'un-ing), n. [Cushion + -ing.] The act of providing with a cushion; a provision of cushions; in mark, the effect produced by a cushion; a cushion or buffer.

If the small quantity [of air] necessary to supply the motor be confined, it will also be able to provide all the cushioning that is desirable. Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 802.

Preadmission, that is to say, admission before the end of the back stroke, which, together with the compression of steam left in the cylinder when the exhaust port closes, produces the mechanical effect of cushioning. Engin. Div., XXII. 501.

cushion-rafter (kush'un-rāf'ter), n. An auxiliary rafter placed beneath a principal one, to relieve an unusual strain.

cushion-scale (kush'un-skāl), n. A very common scale-insect, Icerya purchasi, injurious to the orange and other fruits cultivated in California: so called from the large cushion-like, waxy, fluted ovicase attached to the bodies of the females. It is very active and hardy, is capable of being transported from one continent to another, infests many different cultivated trees and plants, and is a great pest. The female bug has three molts and the male two. Also called cottony cushion-scale, and also white scale, fruit scale, and Australian bug.

cushion-star (kush'un-stār), n. A kind of starfish of the genus Comaster and family Asteriidae. G. equestris, the knotty cushion-star, is a British species.

cushion-stitch (kush'un-stich), n. In embroidery, a stitch by which the ground is covered with straight short lines formed by repeated short stitches. This stitch was much used to form the background of elaborate embroidery in the fifteenth and later centuries, sometimes imitating painting, the colors being mingled with great ingenuity so as to represent clouds, distant foliage, etc.

cushiony (kush'un-ī), a. [Cushion + -y.] Like a cushion; soft and yielding or elastic.

A bow legged character with a flat and cushiony nose. Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, x.

It was this tuft and grassy character of these mountains I am tempted to say their cushiony character—that no reading or picture viewing of mine had prepared me for. The Century, XXVII. 110.

The justice
With eyes severe, and beard of formal cut.
Shak., As you Like it, II. 7.

Pursue the cut, the fashion of the age.
Marton, What you Will, II. 1.

There is the new cut of your doublet or slash, the fashion of your apparel, a quaint cut.

Shirley, Witty Fair One, II. 1.
A sailor has a peculiar cut to his clothes, and a way of wearing them which a green hand can never get.

19. Specifically, in lapidary work, the number and arrangement of the facets on a precious stone which has been polished or cut: as, the double-brilliant cut; the Lisbon cut; dental cut.—20. The act of deliberately passing an acquaintance without appearing to recognise him, or of avoiding him so as not to be accosted by him.

We met and gave each other the cut direct that night.
Thackeray, Book of Snobs, II.

21. Absence when one should be present; a staying away, or a refusal to attend: as, a cut from recitation.—Brilliant cut, half-brilliant cut, double-brilliant cut, Lisbon cut, Portuguese cut, single cut. See brilliant.—Cut over point, in swinging, a passing of the point of the weapon over that of the adversary in thrusting upon him Alonso (ed. Forst).—Degree cut. Same as trap cut.—Dental cut, in gem-cutting, a style of ornamentation consisting of two rows of facets on the top of the stone.—Rose cut, in gem-cutting, a form of ornamentation in which the upper part of the stone has 24 triangular facets, and the back of the stone is flat. When the base is a duplicate of the upper side, the stone becomes a double rose. Rose-cut diamonds are usually set with foil at the back. See brilliant, fig. 7.—Star cut, in diamond-cutting, a form of brilliant-cutting in which the facets on the top and back are so arranged that they resemble a star.—Trap cut. Same as trap cut.—Table cut, in diamond-cutting, a form of ornamentation in which the stone is usually flat, and is cut with long (technically called table) facets with beveled edges, or a border of small facets.—The cut of one's jib, the shape or general appearance of a person: as, I knew him by the cut of his jib. [Originally a sailors' phrase with reference to the characteristic form of a ship's jib.]

The young ladies liked to appear in nautical and lawn-tennis toilet, carried so far that one might refer to the cut of their jib.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 172.

To draw cuts, to draw lots, as of little sticks, straws, papers, etc., cut of unequal lengths.

I think it is best to draw cuts and avoid contention.
J. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 86.

Trap cut, in gem-cutting, a form of ornamentation in which one row or more of long step like facets is arranged on the top or crown of the stone, around the table, and three, six, or more rows of similar steps or degree facets on the back or pavilion; or the top may be brilliant cut, and only the back trap cut, or vice versa. This form of cut intensifies or darkens the color of a stone, and hence is used for the sapphire, emerald, ruby, etc. Also called step cut and degree cut.

cut-against (kut'-a-genst'), n. In bookbinding: (a) The cut made by a bookbinders' knife on cut-heal (kut'hēl), n. [Appar. < cut + heal; from supposed curative properties.] The valerian, Valeriana officinalis.

cuticle (kūt'ikl), n. [= F. cuticule = Sp. cutícula = Pg. cutícula = It. cuticola, < L. cuticula, dim. of cutis, the skin: see cutis.] 1. In soil and anat.: (a) The scarf-skin or epidermis; the outermost layer of the skin, forming the general superficial integument or covering of the body (see cut under skin); by extension, any kind of epidermal or cuticular growths, as nails, claws, hoofs, horns, hair, feathers, etc. Veins and skin, and cuticle and nail.

Bentley, Sermons, 111.

(b) The outermost and very superficial integument in general, without reference to its exact nature; a pellicle; a skin, rind, or other investing structure. (c) Some thick, tough membrane lining an internal organ: as, the cuticle of a fowl's gizzard. (d) In infusorians, specifically, the cell-wall.—2. In bot., a continuous hyaline film covering the surface of a plant and formed of the cutinized outer surfaces of the epidermal cells. Sometimes used as equivalent to epidermis.—3. A thin skin formed on the surface of liquor; a film or pellicle.

When any saline liquor is evaporated to cuticle, the salt concretes in regular figures. Newton, Opticks.

cuticula (kūt'ik'ū-lā), n.; pl. cuticulæ (-lā). [L., dim. of cutis, the skin: see cutis.] In soil and anat.: (a) The cuticle proper; the epidermis; the ectoderm; the exoskeleton; the superficial investment of the body, in so far as this is formed by or derived from the epiblastic cells or epiblast of the embryo, whatever its ulterior modification. (b) In infusorians, a comparatively dense envelop to which the outer wall of the body gives rise. Also cuticulum. (c) In annelids, as the earthworm, a thin and transparent tough membrane, forming the outermost envelop of the body, and perforated by extremely minute vertical canals.

cuticular (kūt'ik'ū-lār), a. [= F. cuticulaire = Sp. cuticular = It. cuticolare; as cuticula + -ar.] Pertaining to or consisting of cuticle, in a broad sense; epidermal.

The oral and gastric regions are armed with cuticular teeth in many Invertebrata. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 16.

cuticularization (kūt'ik'ū-lār-i-sā'shon), n. [< cuticularize + -ation.] Same as cutinization. Also spelled cuticularisation.

cuticularize (kūt'ik'ū-lār-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. cuticularized, ppr. cuticularizing. [< cuticular + -ize.] To render cuticular; give the character, nature, or composition of the cuticle to. Also cuticularise, cutinise.

The rest of the epidermal cells of the tentacles have their exterior walls excessively cuticularized and resistant. W. Gardiner, Proc. Royal Soc., XXXIX. 232.

A cuticularized cell-wall is almost impermeable to water. Knapp, Brit., XII. 41.

cuticulum (kūt'ik'ū-lum), n. [NL., neut. dim. of L. cutis, skin: see cutis, cuticle.] Same as cuticula (b).

cutification (kūt'if-i-kā'shon), n. [< cutify: see -fy and -ation.] Formation of epidermis or of skin.

cutify (kūt'if-i), v. t.; pret. and pp. cutified, ppr. cutifying. [< L. cutis, skin, + -care, make: see cutis and -fy.] To form skin.

cutskins (kūt'ti-kins), n. pl. Spatterdaashes. Also written cutthskins. [Scotch.]

cutin (kūt'in), n. [< L. cutis, the skin, + -in.] According to Frémy, a peculiar modification of cellulose contained in the epidermis of leaves, petals, and fruits, together with ordinary cellulose, and forming the cuticle or cuticular layers. Cutin exhibits under a microscope the aspect of an amorphous perforated film.

cutinization (kūt'it-ni-sā'shon), n. [< cutin + -ation.] In bot., a modification of cell-wall by which they become impermeable to water through the presence of cutin. Also called cuticularization.

cutinise (kūt'it-nis), v. t.; pret. and pp. cutinised, ppr. cutinising. [< cutin + -ise.] Same as cuticularise.

cutipunctor (kūt-ti-pungk'tor), n. [< L. cutis, skin (see cutis), + NL. punctor, < L. pungere, pp. punctus, puncture: see puncture, point.] A surgical instrument for puncturing the skin. E. H. Knight.

cutis (kūt'is), n. [L., the skin, = E. *hide*², q. v.] 1. The skin in general; a skin.—2. The true skin, corium, or derma underlying the cuticle or scarf-skin. See cut under skin.—3. A firmer tissue of some fungi, forming an outer covering.—Cutis asserina, literally, goose-skin; goose-skin; horripilation; a contracted, roughened state of the skin arising from cold, fright, etc. See asserina.—Cutis vera, the true skin, corium, or derma.

cutisector (kūt-ti-sek'tor), n. [< L. cutis, skin (see cutis), + sector, a cutter: see sector.] A knife, consisting of a pair of parallel adjustable blades, used for making thin sections in microscopy. E. H. Knight.

Outiterebra (kūt'ti-te-reb'rg), n. [NL. (Clark, 1815), also contr. Outerebra, < L. cutis, skin, + terebra, a borer, < tere, bore.] A genus of beetles, of the family Cestridae, the species of which infest the male genitals of squirrels, rabbits, and other animals. C. emaculator is an example, so called from the effect it produces.

Larva of Cutiterrebra cuniculi. a, side view, natural size; b, anal end, enlarged; c, head end, enlarged.

cutitis (kūt'ti'tis), n. [< L. cutis, skin, + -itis.] Cytitis. Dunghison.

cutlacet, n. See cutlas.

cutlas, outlas (kut'lās), n. [Formerly also cuttolas, cutlase (also courtolas, cuttle-ax, and cuttal-ax, in simulation of cuttal and ax), perhaps with some thought of a battle-ax], E. dial. also cutlass; < F. coutelas (= It. coltellaccio, dial. coltellao, < OF. coutel, cutel, F. cousteau (> E. cutto) = It. coltello, a knife, dagger, < L. cutellus, a knife, dim. of cutis, a knife, > AS. cuter, E. colter, couiter, the knife of a plow, and (through cutellus) E. cutler, q. v. Not connected with cut.] A short sword or large knife, especially one used for cutting rather than thrusting; specifically, a curved basket-hilted sword of strong and simple make, used at sea, especially when boarding or repelling boarders.

cutlas-fish (kut'lās-fish), n. 1. The thread-fish, Trichiurus lepturus. See hairtail.—2. A fish of the family Gymnotidae, Carapax fasciatus.

cutlass (kut'lās), n. See cutlas.

cutlase, n. See cutlas.

cutler (kut'lēr), n. [< ME. cuteler, < AF. cuteller, OF. cutelier, mod. F. coutelier, < ML. cutellarius, a maker of knives, a soldier armed with a knife, prop. adj., < L. cutellus, a knife, dim. of cutis, a knife: see cutis.] Not connected with cut.] 1. One whose occupation is the making of knives and other cutting instruments.

Like cutler's poetry

Upon a knife, "Love me, and leave me not." Shak., M. of V., v. 1.

Their cutlers that make hilts are more exquisite in that art than any that I ever saw. Coryat, Cruces, 1. 132.

2. One who sharpens or repairs cutlery; a knife-grinder.—Cutler's greenstone. See greenstone.

Outleria (kut-lā'r-i-ā), n. [NL., named after M. Outler, an American botanist (1742-1833).] The representative genus of Outleriaceae. The frond is broad and flat, cut at the margin into narrow segments, as if composed of filaments lying side by side and in some places over one another. Antleria and Antleria are borne on different fronds, both in groups, some-ing phosphoric monoxide. Each anthracinum produces two small reproductive bodies, and each anthracinum one larger one; both escape as spores, but the female cells soon come to rest, and each assumes the form of an oosphere. C. mellea is a British species.

Cutleriaceae (kut-lér-i-á-sé-é), n. pl. [NL., < Cutleria + -aceae.] A small family of olive-colored algae forming a transition between Phaeosporae and Phaeococci. The genera are Cutleria and Zanardinia.

cutlery (kut-lér-i), n. [Cutler + -y.] 1. The business of a cutler.—2. Edged or cutting instruments collectively.

As absurd to make laws fixing the price of money as to make laws fixing the price of cutlery or of broadcloth. Masoning, Hist. Eng., xxi.

cutlet (kut'let), n. [Mod. E., modified in simulation of cut (cf. chop), n., in a similar sense]; = D. Dan. køtlet = G. koletto = Sw. kotelett, < F. colette, OF. coistellet = Pg. coistellet, a cutlet, lit. a little rib, dim. of coste, OF. coste, etc., < L. costa, a rib: see coast, costa.] A piece of meat, especially veal or mutton, cut horizontally from the upper part of the leg, for broiling or frying.

Mutton cutlets, prime of meat. Swift.

cutling (kut'ling), n. [Verbal n. from **cutle*, assumed from cutler, appar. regarded as cutl-er. Cf. peddle from peddler. Cf. also cuttle.] The art of cutlery. Milton.

cutlins (kut'lin), n. pl. [For **cuttings*, < cut + -ing.] In millling, half-ground fragments of grain.

cut-lips (kut'lips), n. 1. A cyprinoid fish of the subfamily Esoglossinae, Esoglossum maculiguna; a stone-toter.—2. The hare-lipped sucker. [Mississippi valley.] See sucker.

cut-lugged (kut'lugd), a. [Sc., < cut + lug, the ear, + -ed.] Crop-eared.

cut-mark (kut'mark), n. A mark put upon a set of warp-threads before they are placed on the warp-beam of a loom, to mark off a certain definite length. The mark shows in the woven fabric, and serves as a measure for cutting.

cutmi (kut'mi), n. [Turk. qutmi (kutm), < Ar. qutn, cotton: see cotton.] A grade of silk and cotton made in the neighborhood of Bursa and elsewhere in Asiatic Turkey, and also in Egypt.

cut-off (kut'of), n. 1. That which cuts off or shortens, as a short path or cross-cut. Specifically.—2. In steam-engines, a contrivance for cutting off the passage of steam from the steam-chest to the cylinder, when the piston has made a part of its stroke, leaving the rest of the stroke to be accomplished by the expansive force of the steam already in the cylinder. It economizes steam, and thus saves fuel. See governor.—3. A new and shorter channel formed for a river by the waters cutting off or across an angle or bend in its course. Cut-offs, sometimes of great extent, are continually forming in the Mississippi and other western rivers. [U. S.]

A second class [of lakes], large in numbers but small in area, is the result of cut-off and other changes of channel in the Mississippi. Reynolds, Brk., xv. 30.

It occasionally happens that by this constant cutting two bends approach each other, until the river cuts the narrow neck of land between them and forms a cut-off, which suddenly and materially reduces its length. Gen. Report on Mississippi River, 1863 (rep. 1876), p. 98.

4. A slide in a delivery-spout in grain-elevators, etc., for shutting off the flow.—5. An arm on a reaper designed to support the falling grain while the platform is being cleared.—6. In plumbing, a connecting pipe.—Adjustable cut-off, a cut-off which can be adjusted to cut off steam at different positions of the piston in the stroke.—Automatic cut-off, a cut-off usually connected with and controlled by the governor of a steam-engine, to cut off steam at any point which will supply the requirements of the engine with reference to its varying duty.—Slider cut-off, a form of cut-off for a steam-valve, consisting of an independent plate sliding upon a back.

cutose (kut'ós), n. [Cutis, skin (see cutis), + -ose.] In bot., a name applied by Frémy to the material composing the hyaline film or cuticle covering the aerial organs of plants.

cut-out (kut'out), n. A kind of switch employed to connect the electric wires passing through a telegraph-instrument, an electric light, etc., and cut out the instrument or the light from the circuit. A safety cut-out usually consists of a fusible wire included in the circuit and mounted upon non-combustible terminals.

cut-pile (kut'pli), n. Having a pile or nap composed of fibers or threads standing erect, produced by shaving the surface so as to cut the loops of thread: said of a textile fabric. The heavier Indian and Levantine rugs, Wilton and Axminster carpets, ordinary velvet, and velveteen are cut-pile goods.

cutpurses (kut'pürs), n. [ME. cutpurses, cutpurses; < cut, v., + obj. purses.] One who cuts purses for the sake of stealing their contents (a practice said to have been common when men were purges at their griddles); hence, a pickpocket.

A cutpurses of the empire and the rule; That from a shelf the precious diadem stole, And put it in his pocket! Shak., Hamlet, III. 4.

cutra (kut'rä), n. A Turkish weight for indigo, equal to 138 pounds 15 ounces avoirdupois.

cutted (kut'ed), p. a. Obsolete or dialectal past participle of cut. Specifically—(a) Short in speech; curt; laconic.

(b) Sharp in speech; tart; peevish; querulous. She's grown so cutted, there's no speaking to her. Middleton, Women Beware Women, III. 1.

cuttela, n. See cutlas.

cutter (kut'er), n. [Cutler, a barber; < cut + -er.] 1. One who cuts or hews; one who shapes or forms anything by cutting.

A skillful cutter of diamonds and pollisher of gems. Boyle, Works, V. 38.

Specifically—(a) Formerly, an officer in the English exchequer whose office it was to provide wood for the tallies, and to cut on them the sums paid. See tally. (b) In tailoring, one who measures and cuts out cloth for garments, or cuts it according to measurements made by another. (c) A bully; a bravo; a swaggering fellow; a sharper; a robber. Also cutler.

He's out of cash, and thou know'st by cutter's law we are bound to relieve one another. Rowley, Match at Midnight.

He with a crew went forth Of lucky cutters stout and bold, And robbed in the North.

True Tale of Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 356).

Because thou art a miscreant bird, and despoil'st thine own natural lineage, and rustest in unpaid silks and velvets, and keepest company with gallants and cutters, must we lose our memory for that? Scott, Monastery, xxvii.

2. That which cuts; an instrument or tool, or a part of one, that cuts: as, a straw-cutter; the cutters of a boring-machine.

Stewpans and saucopans, cutters and moulds, without which a cook of spirits . . . declares it utterly impossible that he can give you anything to eat. Bulwer, Last Days of Pompeii, IV. 2.

Specifically—(a) The broad chisel-edge of a center-bit, lying between the nicker, or outer knife-edge, and the center, or pin. (b) A knife or an indenting-tool used in testing the explosive pressure of powder in large guns. See pressure-gauge. (c) In diamond-cutting, a wooden hand-tool in which that one of two diamonds undergoing cutting which is least advanced is cemented. The other stone is cemented in the setter, and the two are then rubbed together. (d) A wad-punch. E. H. Knight. (e) An upright chisel on an anvil, a back-iron. E. H. Knight. (f) A file-chisel. E. H. Knight. (g) In apt., a cutter. (h) A fore tooth that cuts, as distinguished from a grinder; an incisor.

The other teeth (the cutters and dog teeth) have usually but one root. Boyle, Works, V. 38.

3. Naut.: (a) A double-banked boat used by ships of war.

I hoisted out the cutter, and manned her with an officer and seven men. Cook, Voyages, III. II. 2.

(b) A small vessel with a single mast, a mainsail, a fore-and-aft, and a jib set to bowsprit end. Cutter-yachts are sloop-rigged vessels, and the name is now generally applied to Cutter-yacht.

sloops of considerable draft and comparatively small beam.—4. A small light sloop, with a single seat for one or two persons, usually drawn by one horse. [U. S.]

Sleighs are swarming up and down the street, of all sorts and sizes, from the huge omnibuses with their thirty passengers to the light, airy painted cutters, with their solitary, far-capped tenants. The Upper Ten Thousand, p. 4.

In mining: (a) A joint or crack, generally one which intersects or crosses a better-defined system of cracks or joints in the same rock. (b) In coal-mining, the system of joint-planes in the coal which is of secondary importance, being not so well developed as another set called the back, face, or cleat of the coal: generally used in the plural: as, backs and cutters.—6. In mineral, a crack in the substance of a crystal, which destroys or greatly lessens its value as a lapidary's stone.—7. A soft yellow malmbrick, used for face-work, from the facility with which it can be cut or rubbed down.—8. In a weavers' loom, the box which contains the quills.—Backs and cutters. See back.—Drum cutter, an elliptical or oblong outer-head, so placed on the shaft that it rotates in a circular path; a wabbler. E. H. Knight.—Reconstric cutter. (a) A small instrument used by workers in ivory. It is formed like a drill-stock, and is moved by a bow. The cutting-point can be fixed at different distances from the center by means of a groove and screw. It can also be used on the mandrel of a lathe for ornamenting surfaces. (b) A cutting-tool for a lathe having an independent motion of its own on the slide-rest. It produces eccentric figures, but by a method that is the reverse of that of the eccentric chuck (which see, under chuck).—Hanging cutter, in some plows, a cutter which depends from the plow-beam.—Mill-board cutter. See mill-board.—Revenue cutter, a light-armed government vessel commissioned for the prevention of smuggling and the enforcement of the customs regulations. Formerly the vessels for the protection of the United States revenue were cutter-rigged, but now the name is applied indiscriminately, although almost all the revenue vessels are steamers, and the few remaining sailing vessels are schooner-rigged.—Rigging-cutter, an apparatus for cutting the rigging of sunken vessels, to remove the masts, etc., lest they should interfere with navigation.

cutter (kut'er), v. [E. dial., appar. a var. of quitter, equiv. to whither, speak low, murmur: see quitter, whither.] I. trans. To speak low; whisper; murmur, as a dove.

Cutting Morecraft

Beau and Pl., Scornful Lady, v 3

Cutting-down line, in ship building a curve in the sheers-draft corresponding to the upper surface of the throats of the floors amidships, and to the under side of the keel son.

cutting (kut'ing), n. [ME. cuttinge, hitting; verbal n. of cut, v.] 1. A piece cut off; a slip; a slice; a clipping. Specifically—(a) A small shoot or branch cut from a plant and placed in the earth, or in sand, etc., to root and form a new plant.

Propagation by cuttings has been long known, and is abundantly simple when applied to such free-growing hardy shrubs as the willow and the gooseberry.

London, Encyc. of Gardening, p 687.

(b) A section, a thin slice used for microscopic purposes. (c) A slip cut from a newspaper or other print containing a paragraph or an article which one wishes to use or preserve.

2. An excavation made through a hill of rising ground, in constructing a road, railway, canal, etc.; the opposite of filling.—3. The action of a horse when he strikes the inner and lower part of the fetlock-joint with the opposite hoof while traveling.—4. A caper; a curvet.

Changes, cuttings, turnings, and agitations of the body
Florio, tr. of Montaigne's Essays, p 228

5. In coal-mining, work done in mining or getting coal so that it may be broken down. The holing or undercutting is parallel with the stratification and at the bottom of the mass, the cutting is at right angles to this, and the effect of the two operations is to isolate a certain quantity of coal, which is afterward broken down by powder or wedges. Sometimes called earring.

6. pl. The refuse obtained from the sieve of a hutch.—7. pl. Bruised groats, or oats prepared for gruel, porridge, etc.—8. See the extract.

When the goods show a bright orange colour they are liked and winced in water. This process, the reduction of the reds and pinks to the depth of shade they are to have when finished, is called cutting.

W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico printing, p 576

cutting-board (kut'ing-bōrd), n. A board used on a bench or on the lap in cutting leather or cloth.

cutting-box (kut'ing-boks), n. 1. A machine in which hay, straw, corn-stalks, etc., are cut into short pieces as feed for cattle.—2. In diamond-cutting, a box into which the diamond-dust falls when the diamonds which are cemented into the cutter and setter are rubbed against each other.

cutting-compass (kut'ing-kum'pas), n. A compass one of the legs of which carries a cutter, used for making washers, wads, disks, etc. E. H. Knight.

cutting-engine (kut'ing-en'jin), n. In silk-manuf., a machine for cutting refuse or floss silk, after it has been disentangled and straightened, into short lengths that may be worked upon cotton-machinery.

cutting-file (kut'ing-fil), n. The toothed cutter of a gear-cutting engine. E. H. Knight.

cutting-gage (kut'ing-gāj), n. A tool having a lancet-shaped knife, for cutting veneers and thin wood.

cutting-line (kut'ing-lin), n. In bookbinding, a sketch-line drawn on a folded sheet of book-paper, showing where the cutting-knife will trim the margin.

cutting-lipper (kut'ing-lip'er), n. A cyprinoid fish of the tribe Chondrostomi or subfamily Chondrostominae, having trenchant jaws.

cuttingly (kut'ing-li), adv. In a cutting manner.

cutting-nippers (kut'ing-nip'ers), n. pl. A pair of nippers with sharp jaws especially adapted for cutting. The cutters may be placed either parallel to the axis or at various angles with it. Also cutting-pliers.

cutting-plane (kut'ing-plān), n. A carpenter's smoothing-plane. E. H. Knight.

cutting-pliers (kut'ing-pli'ers), n. pl. Same as cutting-nippers.

cutting-press (kut'ing-pres), n. 1. A screw-press or a fly-press used in cutting shapes or planchets from strips of metal.—2. In bookbinding, a wooden screw-press of small size to which is attached a knife sliding in grooved bearings, used for trimming single books. Also called plow-press or plow and press.

cutting-punch (kut'ing-punch), n. A punch with a circular face for cutting grommet-holes in sails, disks or wads from leather, cloth, metal, etc., tongue-holes in leather straps, and for various similar uses.

cutting-shoe (kut'ing-shō), n. A horseshoe having nails on one side only; a feather-edge shoe: used for horses that cut or interfere. E. H. Knight.

cutting-spade (kut'ing-spād), n. A sharp flat implement, resembling a broad thin chisel, fixed to a pole ten feet or more in length, used to cut the blubber from a whale. C. M. Seamon, Marine Mammals.

cutting-thrust (kut'ing-thrust), n. A tool for making grooves in the sides of boxes, etc.

cuttle<sup>1</sup> (kut'l), n. [Early mod. E. also cuttel; ME. cotul, cotull, codull, rodulle, < AS. cudele, the cuttlefish (L. sepia); also called sdas-scite, lit. ooze-discharger, with reference to its discharge of sepia. The change to cuttle may have been due to association with cuttle<sup>2</sup>, a knife, or with cut, with reference to the shape of the cuttlebone. (cf. W. morylloll, the cuttlefish, lit. sea-knife (< mor, sea, + cylloll, knife); F. dial. rousteau (F. rousteau de mer, cuttlefish, lit. sea-knife.) 1. A cuttlefish.

It is somewhat strange, that . . . only the blood of the cuttle should be as black as ink

Bacon

Shel fish they eat, and the cuttle, whose blood, if I may so term it, is like ink a delicate food, and in great request

Sandys, Travels, p 64

2. Cuttlebone.

cuttle<sup>2</sup> (kut'l), n. [OF. coutel, cuttel, a knife: see cuttl, cutler, cutlas. cf. cutting.] 1. A knife, especially one used by cutpurse or pick-pockets.

Dismembering himself with a sharp cuttle
Ep. Bale, English Votaries, II 2

2. Same as cutter<sup>1</sup>, 1 (c).

I'll thrust my knife in your mouldy chaps, if you play the saucy cuttle with me

Shak, 2 Men. IV, II 4

cuttle<sup>3</sup> (kut'l), v. t. [Var. of cuttle<sup>2</sup>, q. v.] To talk; chat.

I have been to town on purpose to wait on him, recollecting how you used to cuttle over a bit of politics with the old Marquis cuttlebone (kut'l-bōn), n. The internal plate of Sepia officinalis, consisting of a friable calcareous substance, formerly much used in medicine as an absorbent, but now chiefly for polishing wood, paint, varnish, etc., and for pounce and tooth-powder. A cuttlebone is often hung in the cage of canaries, its slightly saline taste being relished by the birds and acting as a gentle stimulus to their appetite, and its substance affording lime for the shells of their eggs. Also called apocot. See cut under Dibranchiata.

cuttlefish (kut'l-fish), n. [< cuttle<sup>1</sup> + fish<sup>1</sup>; cf. D. kuttelisch (Kilian; now inkfish), cephalopodous mollusk, with a depressed body, enclosed in a sac. The shorter arms or feet, eight in number, covered with four rows of suckers or tentacles, are arranged around the mouth, and from the midst of them extend two long tentacles, also furnished with disks. These members the animal uses in walking, for attaching itself to objects, and for seizing its prey. A tube or funnel exists below the head and leads from the gills, through which the water admitted to these organs is expelled; and the creature, by ejecting the water with force, can dart backward with amazing velocity. In a sac on the back of the mantle there is a light, porous, calcareous shell formed of thin plates; this is the cuttlebone or sepist, corresponding to the calamary or open of the squid. (See calamary.) The cuttlefish has the power of ejecting a black, ink-like fluid, the sepia of artists (see sepia), from a bag or sac, so as to darken the water and conceal itself from pursuit. From this usage the term cuttlefish is extended not only to all the forms of Sepioida and related cephalopods, but also to the octopod members of the same class. When the octopods are called cuttlefishes, the decapods are commonly distinguished as squids. The two figures illustrate the two principal types. See Dibranchiata, ink-bag, and Sepia.

ground, and come forth at night to cut off, just above or just below the surface, all sorts of tender plants, but particularly maize, cabbage, and melons. Some, like Agrotis megeroma, climb on vines and young trees and eat out the buds. Agrotis megeroma is one of the commonest.

cuve, cuve, r. Obsolete spellings of cuve.
cuvette (kū-vet'), n. [F., dim. of cuve, < L. cupa, a tub, M.L. a cup, etc.: see cup.] 1. In decorative art, a portable basin of ornamental form in pottery or porcelain, etc., especially one of the flat-bottomed vessels commonly sold with an alginate or water-pot: frequent in falience of the eighteenth century.—2. In glass-manuf., a basin for receiving the melted glass after refining, and decanting it on the table to be rolled into a plate. In casting, the cuvette is lifted by means of gripping-tongs, chains, and a crane, and the contents are poured upon the setting table. E. H. Knight 8. In fort., a trench dug in the middle of a large dry ditch; a cunette.

Cuvieria (kū-vi-ē'ri-ā), n. [NL., < Georges Cuvier, the celebrated French naturalist.] 1. A genus of holothurians, having scales on the dorsal integument.—2. A genus of thecosomatous pteropoda, resembling Styloka, but having the hinder part of the shell partitioned, the fore part swollen and subcylindrical. C. columella is an example. Synonymous with Cleodora. Also Ouviers. Rang, 1837.—3. A genus of scalephs. Péron and Lesueur, 1807.—4. A genus of crustaceans. Desmarest, 1825.

Cuvierian (kū-vi-ē'ri-ān), a. [(Cuvier + -ian.)] In nat. Met., relating or pertaining to or named after Georges Cuvier (1769–1832), or his system of classification.

The three Cuvierian subkingdoms of the Radiata, Articulata, and Mollusca. Deussen, Origin of World, p. 213

Cuvierian organs, in echinoderms, certain appendages of the cloaca, simple or branched, containing a viscous or solid substance. Their function is uncertain.

Cuvieridae (kū-vi-ē'ri-ā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cuvier + -idae.] 1. A family of echinoderms.—2. A family of thecosomatous pteropoda, typified by the genus Cuvieria: generally referred to the family Hyaleidae or Coscinidae.

cuvy (kū'vi), n.; pl. cuvies (-vies). A kind of seaweed, the devil's-apron, Laminaria digitata. (Okeney.)

The Okeney help-man have assigned peculiar names to each, calling the ordinary Laminaria digitata cuvy.

Harvey, Phytologia Britannica.

Cusco bark, Cusco china. Same as Cusco bark (which see, under bark).

Cwmry, n. pl. Same as Cymry.

cwt. An abbreviation compounded of c. for Latin centum, hundred, and wt. for English weight, used for hundredweight.

Cy. The chemical symbol of cyanogen.

-cy. [(1) Of ult. L. origin: formerly also -cie, M.E. -cie, OF. -cie, F. -cie, -ce, etc.; often an extension of -ce (q. v.), resting more directly upon the orig. L. -cia or -cia; as innocence, innocency, convenience, conveniency, etc. (see -ancy, -ency), so fallacy, M.E. fallace, < F. fallace, < L. fallacia, etc.; ult. or directly < L. -cia, or -cia, a termination of abstract nouns, < -ia (as -tia, pp. suffix, or -tia), pp. suffix, or -cia, + -ia, a fem. formative. From meaning 'condition,' the termination has now come to signify, in many newly formed words, 'office'; as in captaincy, curacy, lieutenancy (the final t is merged in -ry = -tia), chaplaincy, cornetcy, etc. (2) Of ult. Gr. origin: < F. -cie, etc., L. -cia, < Gr. -cia; as in fancy, Gr. phantasia; < F. -cie (pron. -ne), < Gr. -ria, as in aristocracy, democracy; < F. -cie, < Gr. -relia, as in neurocracy; < Gr. -relia, as in piracy; etc.] A termination of nouns, chiefly abstract, of various origin, often associated with or derived from adjectives in -ant<sup>1</sup>, -ent, or -ate<sup>1</sup>. See the etymology.

cyamid (si'-a-mid), n. A crustacean of the family Cyamidae.

Cyamidae (si'-a-mi'-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyamus + -idae.] A family of lemodipodous, edriophthalmous crustaceans, formed for the reception of the cephalopod of the genus Cyamus, the species of which are parasitic chiefly on whales, and are known as whale-lice.

Cyamus (si'-a-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. κῡαμος, a bean.] The typical and only genus of lemodipodous crustaceans of the family Cyamidae; the whale-lice. Cyamus ceti has a broad flat body with a rudimentary abdomen.

cyan (si'-an), n. Same as cyanogen.

Cyanæa, n. [NL.] See Cyanæa.

Cyanamide (si'-an'-a-mid or -mid), n. [(cyan + -amide).] A white crystalline body (CN.NH<sub>2</sub>) prepared by the action of ammonia on cyanogen chloride.

cyanate (si'-a-nāt), n. [(cyan + -ate).] A salt of cyanic acid.

cyan-blue (si'-an-blū), n. [(Gr. κῡαρος, dark-blue, + E. blue).] A greenish-blue color; the color of the spectrum from .505 to .487 micron, or of such light mixed with white.

Cyanes (si'-ā-nēs), n. [NL., fem. of L. cyanæus, dark-blue: see cyanæus.]

The typical genus of the family Cyanæidae. The tentacles are bundled beneath the thick lobed disk, and there are 8 radial and as many intermediate gastric pouches, breaking up into small ramifications near the ends of the marginal lobes. C. arctica is the common large red jelly fish of the coast of the United States attaining a diameter of a foot or more. It is capable of stinging severely.

Also Cyanæa.

cyanean (si'-ā-nē-an), a. [(L. cyaneus, dark-blue (see cyanæus), + -an).] Of an azure color; cerulean. Pennant.

Cyaneula (si'-ā-nē-ū-lā), n. [NL., < Gr. κυανέω, dark-blue, + L. dim. -ula.] A genus of silviline birds related to the redstarts (Erythraeus), containing the bluestarts, as C. cyaneus of Europe, Asia, and North America. C. L. Brehm, 1838. See cut under bluestart.

cyaneid (si'-ā-nē-id), n. A jellyfish of the family Cyaneidae.

Cyaneidae (si'-ā-nē-id-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyaneus + -idae.] A family of Decapoda, typified by the genus Cyanea, with a simple cross-shaped mouth, surrounded by four adradial folded mouth-arms. The gastric cavity has 16 or 22 broad radial pouches and branched caudal apertures, with no diaphragm; there are 8 or 16 marginal bodies, and 8 or more long hollow tentacles. Also Cyaneide.

cyaneous (si'-ā-nē-us), a. [(L. cyaneus, < Gr. κυανέω, dark-blue, < κυανός, a dark-blue substance (supposed to be blue steel), lapis-lazuli, the blue corn-flower, sea-water, etc., as adj. dark-blue.]. Azure-blue; cerulean.

cyanic (si'-ā-nik), a. [(Gr. κῡαρος, dark-blue, + -ic. In second sense with ref. to cyanogen.] 1. Blue: in bot., applied to a series of colors in flowers, including all shades of blue, and passing through violet and purple to red. The zanther series, on the other hand, passes from yellow through orange to red. The variations in color of any flower are in general confined to one of these series.

2. Pertaining to or containing cyanogen. — Cyanic acid, a compound of cyanogen and oxygen (CNEO), which is a strong acid, but unstable except at low temperatures.

Europe, Asia, and North America. C. L. Brehm, 1838. See cut under bluestart.

cyaneid (si'-ā-nē-id), n. A jellyfish of the family Cyaneidae.

Cyaneidae (si'-ā-nē-id-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyaneus + -idae.] A family of Decapoda, typified by the genus Cyanea, with a simple cross-shaped mouth, surrounded by four adradial folded mouth-arms. The gastric cavity has 16 or 22 broad radial pouches and branched caudal apertures, with no diaphragm; there are 8 or 16 marginal bodies, and 8 or more long hollow tentacles. Also Cyaneide.

cyanide (si'-ā-ni-dē or -nid), n. [(cyan + -ide).] In chem., a combination of cyanogen with an element or a compound radicle capable of acting as an element. Potassium cyanide is the most important. It is a crystalline solid, permanent in dry air, but decomposed in moist air, giving off an odor of prussic or hydrocyanic acid. It has a bitter taste, and is extremely poisonous. It is extensively used in photography, electro metallurgy, and as a laboratory reagent. — Cyanide powder, a salt of potassium, much used in electroplating.

cyanine (si'-ā-nin), n. [(Gr. κῡαρος, dark-blue, + -ine).] The blue coloring matter of certain flowers, as the corn-flower, violet, and species of iris. — Cyanine blue. See blue.

cyanite (si'-ā-nit), n. [(Gr. κῡαρος, dark-blue, + -ite).] A silicate of aluminium, occurring in bladed to fibrous crystalline aggregates and in trielitic crystals. Its prevailing color is blue, whence its name, but varying from a fine Prussian blue to sky-blue or bluish white, also green or gray. It has the same composition as andalusite and kyanite. Also kyanite and kyanite. See cut under bladed.

Cyanoccephalus (si'-ā-nō-sef'-ā-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. κῡαρος, dark-blue, + κεφαλή, head.] A notable genus of corvine birds of America, having a short square tail, long pointed wings, a peculiarly shaped bill, and naked nostrils. It contains but one species, the blue crow of North America, C. cyaneus; also called blue-headed jay and blue jay. It represents a type intermediate between crows and jays. The bird is abundant in the mountainous regions of the West, especially where the pitch pine grows.

Cyanochroa (si'-ā-nō-kro'-yā), n. [NL., < Gr. κῡαρος, dark-blue, + χρῶμα, color.]. In pathol., a blue or livid color: same as cyanosis.

Cyanochroic (si'-ā-nō-kro'-ik), a. [(cyanochroa + -ic).] Of a bluish color; affected with cyanochroa; cyanosed.

Cyanochrous (si'-ā-nōk'-rus), a. [(cyanochroa + -ous).] Same as cyanochroic.

Cyanocitta (si'-ā-nō-sit'-ā), n. [NL. (Strickland, 1845), < Gr. κῡαρος, dark-blue, + κῡττα, Attic form of κῡαρος, a chattering bird, the jay, or, according to others, the magpie.]. A genus of American jays, of which blue is the chief color.

The typical genus of the family Cyanocittidae. The tentacles are bundled beneath the thick lobed disk, and there are 8 radial and as many intermediate gastric pouches, breaking up into small ramifications near the ends of the marginal lobes. C. arctica is the common large red jelly fish of the coast of the United States attaining a diameter of a foot or more. It is capable of stinging severely.

Also Cyanæa.

cyanean (si'-ā-nē-an), a. [(L. cyaneus, dark-blue (see cyanæus), + -an).] Of an azure color; cerulean. Pennant.

Cyaneula (si'-ā-nē-ū-lā), n. [NL., < Gr. κυανέω, dark-blue, + L. dim. -ula.] A genus of silviline birds related to the redstarts (Erythraeus), containing the bluestarts, as C. cyaneus of Europe, Asia, and North America. C. L. Brehm, 1838. See cut under bluestart.

cyaneid (si'-ā-nē-id), n. A jellyfish of the family Cyaneidae.

Cyaneidae (si'-ā-nē-id-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyaneus + -idae.] A family of Decapoda, typified by the genus Cyanea, with a simple cross-shaped mouth, surrounded by four adradial folded mouth-arms. The gastric cavity has 16 or 22 broad radial pouches and branched caudal apertures, with no diaphragm; there are 8 or 16 marginal bodies, and 8 or more long hollow tentacles. Also Cyaneide.

cyaneous (si'-ā-nē-us), a. [(L. cyaneus, < Gr. κυανέω, dark-blue, < κυανός, a dark-blue substance (supposed to be blue steel), lapis-lazuli, the blue corn-flower, sea-water, etc., as adj. dark-blue.]. Azure-blue; cerulean.

cyanic (si'-ā-nik), a. [(Gr. κῡαρος, dark-blue, + -ic. In second sense with ref. to cyanogen.] 1. Blue: in bot., applied to a series of colors in flowers, including all shades of blue, and passing through violet and purple to red. The zanther series, on the other hand, passes from yellow through orange to red. The variations in color of any flower are in general confined to one of these series.

2. Pertaining to or containing cyanogen. — Cyanic acid, a compound of cyanogen and oxygen (CNEO), which is a strong acid, but unstable except at low temperatures.

cyanide (si'-ā-ni-dē or -nid), n. [(cyan + -ide).] In chem., a combination of cyanogen with an element or a compound radicle capable of acting as an element. Potassium cyanide is the most important. It is a crystalline solid, permanent in dry air, but decomposed in moist air, giving off an odor of prussic or hydrocyanic acid. It has a bitter taste, and is extremely poisonous. It is extensively used in photography, electro metallurgy, and as a laboratory reagent. — Cyanide powder, a salt of potassium, much used in electroplating.

cyanite (si'-ā-nit), n. [(Gr. κῡαρος, dark-blue, + -ite).] A silicate of aluminium, occurring in bladed to fibrous crystalline aggregates and in trielitic crystals. Its prevailing color is blue, whence its name, but varying from a fine Prussian blue to sky-blue or bluish white, also green or gray. It has the same composition as andalusite and kyanite. Cyanochroa (si'-ā-nō-kro'-yā), n. [NL., < Gr. κῡαρος, dark-blue, + χρῶμα, color.]. In pathol., a blue or liv

The term is used with great latitude by different writers, sometimes covering all the American blue jays, and sometimes restricted to one or another group of the same, exchanging places with Cyanocorax, Cyanogarrulus, Cyanocitta, Cyanurus, etc. Its type is the common crested blue jay of the United States, C. cristata. C. stelleri is Steller's jay of western North America, which runs into several local races.

Cyanocorax (si'-a-nok'-o-raks), n. [NL. (Boie, 1836), < Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + korax, raven, crow.] A genus of American blue jays. See Cyanocitta.

Cyanoderma (si'-a-nō-dēr-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + derma, skin.] In pathol., same as cyanosis.

Cyanogarrulus (si'-a-nō-gar'-ō-lus), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1850), < Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + L. garrulus, chattering.] A genus of American blue jays. See Cyanocitta.

Cyanogen (si'-an'-ō-jen), n. [< Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + γεν, producing: see gen.] Chemical symbol Cy. A compound radical, CN, composed of one atom of nitrogen and one of carbon. This radical cannot exist free, but the double radical ( $C_2N_2$ ) exists as a gas called cyanogen. It is a gas of a strong and peculiar odor, resembling that of crushed peach-leaves, and burning with a rich purple flame. Under a pressure of between three and four atmospheres it becomes a limpid liquid; and it is highly poisonous and irreparable. It is obtained by heating dry mercury cyanide. It unites with oxygen, hydrogen, and most other non-metallic elements, and also with the metals, forming cyanides. In combination with iron it forms pigments of a dark-blue color, variously called Prussian blue, Chinese blue, Berlin blue, and Turnbull's blue. Also cyan.

Cyanometer (si'-a-nom'-e-ter), n. [< Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + μετρον, a measure.] A meteorological instrument contrived by Saussure for estimating or measuring degrees of blueness, as in the sky. It consists of a band of patchboard divided into fifty-one numbered compartments, each of which is painted of a different shade of blue, beginning at one end with the deepest shade, formed by a mixture of black, and ending with the faintest, formed by a mixture of white. The hue of the object is measured by its correspondence with one of these shades.

Cyanometry (si'-a-nom'-e-tri), n. [As cyanometer + -y.] The measurement of intensity of blue light, especially of the blue of the sky: as, "cyanometry and polarization of sky-light." Encyc. Brit., XVII, 481.

Cyanopathy (si'-a-nop'-a-thi), n. [< Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + πάθος, suffering.] Same as cyanosis.

Cyanophyceae (si'-a-nō-fis'-ē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + φυκος, seaweed: see Phycous.] A name frequently used for Cryptophyceae.

Cyanophyl, cyanophyll (si'-an'-ō-fil), n. [< Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + φύλλον = L. folium, leaf. Cf. chlorophyll.] A name given by Frémy to a blue substance developed in the analysis of chlorophyll. See chlorophyll.

Cyanose (si'-a-nōs), n. [< Gr. kyanos, dark-blue.] Same as cyanosis.

Cyanosed (si'-a-nō-sēd), a. [< cyanose + -ed.] In pathol., exhibiting cyanosis; of a bluish color from defect of circulation.

Cyanosis (si'-a-nō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + -osis.] In pathol., a blue or more or less livid color of the surface of the body, due to imperfect circulation and oxygenation of the blood; the blue jaundice of the ancients. In its worst form it is due to a congenital malformation of the heart, in which the foramen between the right and left auricles remains open after birth instead of closing up. Also cyanopathy, cyanoderma, cyanochroa, blue disease.

Cyanotite (si'-an'-ō-tit), n. [< Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + -itis.] Sulphate of copper, or blue vitriol. Also called cyanose, chalcocyanite.

Cyanospiza (si'-a-nō-spi'-s), n. [NL. (S. F. Baird, 1858), < Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + ορνίς, a bird of the finch kind, perhaps the chaffinch.] A genus of American finches, of small size, with moderate bill, and blue or richly variegated coloration: now usually called Passerina.

It contains the common indigo bird of the United States (C. cyanea), the lazuli finch (C. americana), the nonpareil, incomparable, or pape (C. rufa), etc. See cut under medium bird.

Cyanotic (si'-a-nō-tik), a. [< cyanosis: see -otic.] Pertaining to or resembling cyanosis; affected with cyanosis.

Cyanotis (si'-a-nō-tis), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1837), < Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + οὐς (ur-) = E. ear.] A genus of South American clamatorial flycatchers, of the family Tyrannidae, the only species of which is C. rubrigastra, of Chili.

Cyanotrichite (si'-a-nō-tri'-kit), n. [< Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + τριχίτης (trix'-i), hair, + -ite.] A hydrous sulphate of copper and aluminium, occurring in velvety druses of a bright-blue color. Also called lithotrite.

Cyanotype (si'-an'-ō-tip), n. [< cyan (ide) + -type.] A photographic picture obtained by the use of a cyanide.

Cyanurate (si'-a-nū'-rāt), n. [< cyanur (ide) + -ate.] A salt of cyanuric acid.

Cyanuret (si'-an'-ō-rēt), n. [< cyanogen + -uret.] A basic compound of cyanogen and some other element or compound; a cyanide.

Cyanuric (si'-a-nū'-rik), a. [< cyanogen + -uric.] In chem., used only of an acid ( $C_3H_3N_3O_3$ ), the product of the decomposition of the solid cyanogen chloride by water, of the soluble cyanates by dilute acids, of urea by heat, of uric acid by destructive distillation, etc. It is colorless, inodorous, and has a slight taste. It is a tri-basic acid, and its salts are termed cyanurates.

Cyanurus (si'-a-nū'-rus), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1831), < Gr. kyanos, dark-blue, + οὐρα, tail.] A genus of American blue jays. The common crested blue jay is often called C. cristatus. See Cyanocitta. Also Cyanura.

Cyar (si'-ār), n. [NL., < Gr. κνῆρα, a hole.] The internal auditory meatus.

Cyathaxonia (si'-a-thak-sō'-ni-s), n. [NL., < Gr. kyathos, a cup, + ἀξων, an axle, axis.] The typical genus of fossil stone-corals of the family Cyathaxoniidae. Mitchell, 1846.

Cyathaxoniidae (si'-a-thak-sō'-ni'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyathaxonia + -idae.] A family of rugose tetracoraline stone-corals, having a simple corallum, well-developed septa, and open interspersal spaces. It ranges from the Paleozoic to the present age. The corallum is simple, with a deep calice, exhibiting the tetramerous arrangement in the well-developed septa with open loculi lacking dissepiments or tabulae. They resemble the Turbinolidae, and comprise the only extant rugose corals.

Cyathes (si'-ath'-ē-s), n. [NL., < Gr. kyathos, a cup, < κύπελλον, contain.] A genus of arborescent ferns, order Polypodiaceae. It is characterized by having the spores, which are borne on the back of the frond, inclosed in a cup-shaped indusium. There are many species scattered over the tropical regions of the world. Some have short stems, but in others they reach a height of 40 or 50 feet. The stems are crowned with a beautiful head of large fronds. C. medullaris, a fine bi-pinnate or tripinnate species of New Zealand and the Pacific Islands, and known in gardens as a noble tree-form of comparatively hardy character, furnishes in its native country a common article of food. The part eaten is the soft, pulpy, medullary substance which occupies the center of the trunk, and which has some resemblance to sago. Several species are cultivated in greenhouses for decorative purposes.

Cyathococcus (si'-ath'-ō-s'-shius), a. [< Cyathos + -coccus.] Resembling or pertaining to ferns of the genus Cyathos.

Cyathi, n. Plural of cyathus.

Cyathia, n. Plural of cyathum.

Cyathiform (si'-a-thi'-fōrm), a. [= F. cyathiforme, < L. cyathus (see cyathus), a ladle, a cup, + forma, shape.] In the form of a cup or drinking-glass, a little widened at the top. In bot., applied to cup-shaped organs, as to the circular crown of the flower of Nerium, also to cup-shaped organs in lower cryptogams. In entom., applied to joints of the antennae, etc. when they are more or less obconical, and hollowed at the ends.

Cyathium (si'-ath'-i-um), n.; pl. cyathia (-i). [NL., < Gr. kyathos, a cup.] In bot., a name occasionally given to the peculiar monoclous inflorescence of Euphorbia, consisting of a cup-like involucre inclosing several naked male flowers, each consisting of a single stamen, and a single naked pistillate flower.

Cyathocrinidae (si'-a-thi'-krin'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyathocrinus + -idae.] A family of crinoids, exemplified by the genus Cyathocrinus. It embraces fistulatus crinoids with a digellic base, globose calyx, radials with horsehoe like lateral facets, supporting at least two brachials, but frequently several more, and the arms have no true pinnales, but branches in regular succession to their tips. The species lived in the Paleozoic seas.

Cyathocrinite (si'-a-thok'-ri-nit), n. [< NL. cyathocrinites, < Gr. kyathos, a cup, + κρίν, a lily, + -ites.] A crinoid of the family Cyathocrinidae.

Cyathocrinus (si'-a-thok'-ri-nus), n. [NL., originally Cyathocrinites: see cyathocrinites.] A genus of fossil crinoids or encrinites, ranging from the Silurian to the Permian, sometimes made type of a family Cyathocrinidae.

Cyathoid (si'-a-thoid), a. [< Gr. kyathos, a cup, + -oid, form.] Cup-shaped; cyathiform.

Cyatholith (si'-ath'-ō-lith), n. [< Gr. kyathos, a cup, + λίθος, stone.] A form of coccolith.

When viewed sideways or obliquely, however, the cyatholiths are found to have a form somewhat resembling that of a shirt-stud. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 408.

Cyathophyllidae (si'-a-thō-fil'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyathophyllum + -idae.] A family of Paleozoic stone-corals, of the group Rugosa or Tetracoralia, having symmetrically arranged septa in groups of multiples of four. The species are known as cup-corals, and constitute the largest and most important family of the rugose corals. The corallum is simple or compound, with more or less interrupted septa which do not form complete laminae from top to bottom of the visceral chamber, and the loculi are more or less interrupted by dissepiments. Tabulae are always present. The genera are numerous, and all Paleozoic. The family is divided by Edwards and Halmes into two subfamilies, Cyathophyllinae and Saprininae.

Cyathophyllinae (si'-a-thō-fil'-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < (Cyathophyllum + -inae).] The typical subfamily of cup-corals of the family Cyathophyllidae.

Cyathophylline (si'-a-thō-fil'-in), a. Of or relating to the Cyathophyllinae or Cyathophyllidae.

Cyathophylloid (si'-a-thō-fil'-oid), a. [< Cyathophyllum + -oid.] Resembling the Cyathophyllidae.

Corals (cyathophylloid forms, with Favosites, Syringopora, &c.), abound, especially in the Cretaceous Limestone. Geol. Encyc. Brit., X, 244.

Cyathophyllum (si'-a-thō-fil'-um), n. [NL., < Gr. kyathos, a cup, + φύλλον = L. folium, a leaf.] The typical genus of fossil cup-corals, of the family Cyathophyllidae. Goldschmidt.

Cyathosolid (si'-a-thō-sō'id), n. [< Gr. kyathos, a cup, + ζωοειδής, like an animal: see zoooid.] In ascidians, an abortive first stage of the embryo of certain compound ascidians, as of those of the genus Pyrosoma, serving only to found a colony by gemmation. See the extract.

The result of the process of yolk-division is the formation of an elongated flattened blastoderm, which occupies one pole of the egg, and is converted into what I termed the cyathosolid, which is... a sort of rudimentary ascidian. From this, a prolongation or stolon is given off, which becomes divided by lateral constrictions into four portions, each of which gives rise to a complete ascidioid. As these increase in size, they coil themselves round the cyathosolid, with their oral openings outwards and their cloacal openings inwards, and thus lay the foundation of a new ascidiarium. The cyathosolid eventually disappears, and its place is occupied by the central cloacal cavity. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 528.

Cyathus (si'-a-thus), n.; pl. cyathi (-thi). [L., a cup or ladle, < Gr. kyathos, a cup or ladle: see def.] 1. In Gr. anthg., a form of vase with a long handle, used especially for dipping, as for taking wine from the crater to pour into the oinochoe or directly into the cup. It was often made in the form of a ladle.

—2. An ancient liquid measure, equivalent to 1/10 of a sextes, or 1/4 of a coteyle. It is usually taken as 4.56 cubic centimeters. As a weight, it was 1 1/2 ounces, but is often taken loosely as 1 ounce.

3. In bot., a name sometimes given to a small conical or cup-shaped organ or cavity, as one of the receptacles on the frond of Marchantia.

4. [cap.] A genus of fungi belonging to the Microthecaceae. The peridium is at first closed by a veil, then widely open, like an imbricated cup, which are attached beneath to the walls of the peridium by peduncles.

Black-figured Cyathus.

Cybele (sik'e-lē), n. [L., < Gr. Κυβέλη, also written Κυβέρα, L. Cybēra.] 1. In classical myth., an earth-goddess, of Phrygian and Cretan origin, but identified by the Greeks with Rhea, daughter of Uranus and Ge, or Heaven and Cybele and Attis.—Roman relief, 3d century A. D.

Earth, wife of Cronus or Saturn, and mother of Zeus or Jupiter—hence called the Mother of the Gods, or the Great Mother. In art, Cybele usually wears the mural crown and a veil, and is seated on a throne with her sacred lions at her feet. 2. [N.L.] In soöl., a genus of trilobites. Loew, 1845.

Cyblum (sik'i-um), n. [N.L., < L. cyblum, a tunny-fish, a dish made of tunny-fish salted in pieces, < Gr. κίβυν, the flesh of the tunny salted in (square) pieces (< κίβος, a cube, a piece of salt fish); cf. κίβιστος, a kind of tunny.] A genus of fishes, of the family Scombridae. A number of species are natives of the seas of the East Indies, and some are much esteemed for the table. One species, C. commersoni, is used in a dried as well as in a fresh state.

Cycad (sik'ad), n. One of the Cycadales.
Cycadaceae (sik-a-dā'sē-sē), n. pl. [Cycas (Cycad) + -aceae.] A very peculiar natural order of gymnospermous plants, in many particulars having affinities with the ferns, though some of the genera resemble palms in their general appearance. They are long-lived and of slow growth. The stem is rarely branched, is elongated by a terminal bud, and bears a crown of large pinnate leaves, which are circinate in vernation. The flowers are dioecious, the male flowers in terminal cones formed of scales bearing numerous one-celled anthers on the dorsal surface. The seeds are borne on the margins of altered leaves in the genus Cycas, and on the inner surface of the petiole scales of a cone in the other genera. The wood is without resin, and the pith large. The plants of this order inhabit India, Australia, the Cape of Good Hope, and tropical America. There are about 60 species, in 9 genera, of which the chief are Cycas, Samolus, Macrozamia, Encephalartos, and Dioon. The farinaceous pith of various species is used for food, and they are frequently cultivated in hothouses for ornament or because of their curious habit. The Cycadaceae are found in the various geological formations, beginning with the Permian. They are exceedingly abundant in the Mesozoic, and especially in the earlier stages of that series. (See Mesozoic.) On this account the Mesozoic formations are sometimes classed together as representing the "age of cycads." See Pterophyllum, Samolus, Oleaceae, Pteris, Podocarpus.

Cycadaceae (sik-a-dā'sē-sē), n. In bot., belonging to or resembling the natural order Cycadaceae.

Cycadiform (sik-ad'i-fōrm), n. [Cycas (Cycad) + L. forma, shape.] Resembling in form the cycads.

Cycas (sik'as), n. [N.L., < Gr. κύκας, orig. applied to the African coccol-palm.] 1. A genus of plants, natural order Cycadaceae, natives of Asia, Polynesia, and Australia. They are trees with simple stems, bearing a crown of crowded pinnate leaves with numerous narrow leaflets. The pollen is contained in valvate anthers on the under surface of scales, which are united into large cones. The seeds are borne on the edges of greatly altered leaves, produced in the regular series of the ordinary leaves. The seeds of several species are made into flour for bread, and the pith of the trunk yields a coarse sago, whence the common but incorrect name of sago-palm. The species frequently cultivated in hothouses are C. revoluta, from China and Japan, and C. circinnalis, of the East Indies. The seeds of the latter are known as madu-nuta.

2. [L. c.] A plant of the genus Cycas.

Cychia, cychlid, etc. See Cichla, etc.

Cycladidae (sik-lad'i-dē), n. pl. [N.L., < (Cycas (Cyclad) + -idae).] A family of siphonate bivalve mollusks, taking name from the genus Cycas: now called Sphæridæ (which see).

Cyclamen (sik'la-men), n. [N.L., < Gr. κύκλαμνος, also κύκλαμν, cyclamen, appar. < κύκλος, a circle, referring, it is said, to the corm or bulb-like root.] 1. A small genus of bulbous primulaeaceae plants, natives of southern Europe and western Asia. They are low herbs with very hard some flowers, and are favorite greenhouse-plants. The fleshy tubers, though arid, are greedily sought after by swine; hence the vulgar name swinebread.

2. [L. c.] A plant of the genus Cyclamen.

cyclamin (sik'la-min), n. [Cyclamen (en) + -in.] A vegetable principle found in the root of species of Cyclamen. It is white, amorphous, or in minute crystals, and has a bitter, acrid taste.

cyclamon (sik'la-mon), n. [Cyclamen (en) + -on.] In ceram., a purplish-red tint of modern introduction.

Cyclanthus (sik-lan'thus), n. [N.L., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + άνθος, a flower.] A small genus of palm-like plants, type of the natural order Cyclanthaceae, which is allied to the Pandanaeae and includes one other genus, Cariacanthus. The species inhabit tropical America. They have fan-shaped leaves, and unisexual flowers arranged in spiral bands around the spadix.

Cyclarhis (sik'la-ris), n. [N.L. (Swainson, 1824); also written Cyclaris, Cyclarhis, more correctly Cyclorhis, and strictly Cyclorhis; < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + ῥίς, nose.] A genus of American oscine passerine birds, of the family Trogonidae, or greenlets, with rounded nostrils. C. cyaneris is an example. There are some 10 species, ranging from Mexico to Paraguay.

cyclarthrodial (sik-lā-thrō-di-al), n. [C. Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + άρθρῶς, a particular kind of articulation, < άρθρον, articulated: see arthrodia.] Having the character of a rotatory diarthrosis or lateral ginglymus; of or pertaining to a cyclarthrosis: as, cyclarthrodial articulation; cyclarthrodial movement.

cyclarthrosis (sik-lā-thrō-sis), n. [N.L., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + άρθρῶς, articulation.] In anat., a circular or rotatory articulation, as that by means of which the head of the radius turns on the ulna, and the atlas rolls on the pivot of the axis. In the former case a circle represented by the head of the bone turns through nearly 180° upon its own center, a segment of its circumference gliding in the lesser sigmoid cavity of the ulna. In the splanchnic articulation a ring swings back and forth upon a pivot at one point inside the circumference. Also called rotatory diarthrosis and lateral ginglymus.

cycas (sik'as), n. [L., < Gr. κύκας, prop. adj., round (so. τόπος, garment), < κύκλος, round. Cf. cyclotron.] 1. An upper tunic of ornamental character worn by women under the Roman empire, and assumed by some emperors considered effeminate, as Caligula. It was made of fine material, and had its name from the border embroidered in purple and gold which surrounded it at the bottom.

2. An outer garment similar to the surcoat, apparently circular in form, worn in the fourteenth century, especially by women. When worn by knights over their armor, it was longer behind than before, and not very close-fitting; in this use it preceded the jupon.

This . . . cycas was in fashion . . . only in the early half of the fourteenth century, and the cycas . . . with it are far from numerous.

Blossom, Archæol. Jour., XXXV. 252.

3. [cap.] [N.L.] The typical genus of mollusks of the family Cycladidae, or Sphæridæ, having the shell equivalent, thin, ventricose, with external ligament and thick horny epidermis. The species are numerous in fresh water. Also called Sphærum.

cyclo (sik'lo), n. [= F. cycle = Sp. It. ciclo = Pg. ciclo, < L.L. cyclois, < Gr. κύκλος, a ring, circle, wheel, disk, orb, orbit, revolution, period of time, collection of poems, etc., prob. contr. from κύκλος = AS. wæcel, contr. wæcel (> E. wheel, q. v.), = Skt. chakra, a wheel, disk, circle; prob. redupl. from a root **kar*, "to turn" (see in Gr. κύκλος, roll (> ult. E. cylinder, q. v.).] 1. An imaginary circle or orbit in the heavens.

The sphere
With centric and eccentric scribbled o'er,
Cycle and epicycle, orb in orb
Newton, P. L., viii. 84.

2. A round of years or a recurring period of time used as a larger unit in reckoning time; especially, a period in which certain astronomical phenomena go through a series of changes which recur in the corresponding parts of the next period.—3. Any long period of years; an age.

The cycle of a change sublime Still sweeping through.

Whittier, The Reformer.

Things exist just so long as conditions exist, whether that be a moment or a cycle.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, 1st ser., VI. ii. § 10.

4. Any round of operations or events; a series which returns upon itself; specifically, in physics, a series of operations by which a substance is finally brought back to the initial state.—5. In literature, the aggregate of legendary or traditional matter accumulated round some mythical or heroic event or character, as the siege of Troy and the Argonautic expedition of antiquity, or the Round Table, the Cid, and the Nibelungs of medieval times, and embodied in epic or narrative poetry or in romantic prose narrative.

Their superstition has more of interior belief and less of ornamental machinery than those to which Amadis de Gaul and other heroes of the later cycles of romance furnished a model. Hallam, Introduct. Lit. of Europe, I. ii. § 27.

It is a well-known fact that many of the most popular traditional ballads, such as those of the Arthurian cycle, "Hynd Horn" and others, were simply abridgments of older metrical romances. N. and Q., 7th ser., II. 421.

6. In bot.: (a) In the theory of spiral leaf-arrangement, a complete turn of the spire which is assumed to exist. (b) A closed circle or whorl of leaves.—7. In coral, a set of septa of equal length. See septum.

The cycles are numbered according to the lengths of the septa, the longest being counted as the first. In the young, an equal septa constitute the first cycle.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 147.

8. As used by the old medical sect of Methodists, an aggregate of curative means continued during a certain number of days, usually nine. Dungham.—9. [Partly as an inclusive abbreviation of bicycle and tricycle, but with ref. also to the orig. Gr. κύκλος, a wheel.] A bicycle or tricycle; a "wheel." [Recent.]

All the many wagons and carriages and cycles we saw above us on the modern road were being led, not driven.
J. and F. R. Pennell, Canterbury Pilgrimage.

Carnot's cycle, the succession of operations undergone by the substance in the interior of Carnot's imaginary engine; namely, the piston is first forced down without the escape of any heat by conduction; next, heat is communicated to the contents of the cylinder, but pressure is removed from the piston, so that there is no change of temperature; third, the conduction of heat being stopped, further pressure is removed, so that the piston rises still further; finally, heat is removed from the contents of the cylinder, but pressure is put on to the piston so as to preserve the temperature unchanged until the body in the cylinder is brought back to its original condition; or all these operations are reversed.—Chinese cycle. See seer-ayenay cycle.—Cycle of indiction, an arbitrary period of 15 years used in Roman and ecclesiastical history. The year A. D. 513 is taken as the first year of the first cycle.—Cycle of the saros, or Chaldean cycle, a period of very nearly 6,585 days, in which eclipses recur nearly in the same way.—Heddomadal or heptal cycle, a period of seven days or years, which was supposed, either in its multiple or submultiple, to govern many phenomena of animal life. Dunghison.—Metonic cycle, the lunar solar cycle, established by the Greek astronomer Meton, the first year of the first cycle beginning 432 B. C., June 27. It contained 19 years, of which 12 consisted of 12 lunations, and the other 7—that is to say, the 3d, 5th, 8th, 11th, 14th, 16th, and 19th—consisted of 13 lunations. At the end of the cycle the sun was in about the same position as at the beginning; in fact, 19 tropical years are 6,939.60 days, while 252 lunations are 6,939.69 days, so that there is a difference of only about 2 hours between the two. This cycle is used in ecclesiastical computations in determining the date of Easter. See golden number, under golden.—Paschal cycle, a period of 542 years, after which Easter falls on the same day of the year.—Sexagenary cycle, a cycle of 60 (years, days, hours, etc.) in use throughout the Chinese empire and the countries receiving their literature and civilization from China. It is said to have been contrived by the Emperor Hwang te, 2637 B. C. Frequently called the Chinese cycle.—Solar cycle, or cycle of Sandaga, a period of 26 years, after which the days of the week, according to the old style or Julian calendar, recur on the same days of the month.—Sothiac cycle or period, the canicular year, annus sothicus, or annus soicus, a period of 1,461 years, used in ancient Egypt.—The epic cycle, in ancient Greek literature, a series of epics collected and arranged by grammarians of the Alexandrian period, so as to present a continuous mythic history from the marriage of the first divine pair, Uranus and Ge (Heaven and Earth), to the death of Odysseus (Ulysses). With the exception of the Iliad and the Odyssey, only a few short passages from the poems included in this cycle have come down to us.

It may be that no life is found,
Which only to one engine bound Falls off, but cycle always round.

Tennyson, Two Voices.

2. [See cycle<sup>1</sup>, n., 9.] To ride or take exercise on a bicycle or tricycle. [Recent.]

It was a mistake to suppose that cycling was only suitable for the young and active; people of all ages and conditions might enjoy the benefits of the wheel.

Nature, XXXIII, 180.

The cycling excursion may be of too extended a nature.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII, 354.

cycle<sup>2</sup>, n. A false spelling of stickle. Fuller.
Cycleptus (sik-lep-ti's), n. pl. [NL., < Cycloptus + -ina.] A subfamily of catostomid fishes, typified by the genus Cycleptus, with a long dorsal fin, elongated body, and no interparietal fontanel.

Cycleptus (si-klep-tus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + λεπτός, thin, fine.] The typical and only known genus of Cycleptinae. There is but one Black-horse (Cycleptus elongatus).

(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

species, C. elongatus, growing to a length of 2½ feet, common in the Mississippi valley, and popularly known as the black-horse, sucker, round-mouth, powdered-sucker, sucker, and Missouri sucker.

cycli, n. Plural of cyclos, 1.

cyclian (sik-li-an), a. [L. cyclius, a cycle, + -ian.] Same as cyclic.

The Cycloids poets, who formed the introduction and continuation to the Iliad, were therein as much drawn upon as Homer himself.

C. O. Muller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 415.

cyclic (sik'lik), a. [F. cyclique = Sp. cíclico = Pg. cyclico = It. ciclico, < L. cyclicus, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle; see cyclo<sup>1</sup>.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to or moving in a cycle or circle; specifically, governed by a regular law of variation, according to which the final and initial terms of the series of changes or states are identical.

All the cyclic heavens around me span

Mrs. Browning, Drama of Elfrida.

2. Connected with a literary cycle: specifically applied to certain ancient Greek poets (sometimes inclusive of Homer) who wrote on the Trojan war and the adventures of the heroes connected with it. See cyclo<sup>1</sup>, 5.

The cyclic aspect of a nation's literary history has been so frequently observed that any reference to it involves a truism.

Sedgwick, Vict. Poets, p. 281.

3. In anc. metric, delivered more rapidly than usual, so as to occupy only three times or more instead of four: used to note certain dactyls and anapaests. Thus, a cyclic dactyl is equivalent in time to a trochee, and a cyclic anapest to an iambus.—Cyclic axis of a cone of the second order, a line through the vertex perpendicular to the circular section of the cone. Boole, 1852.—Cyclic chord. See chord.—Cyclic dyad. See dyad.—Cyclic flower, a flower in which the parts are arranged in distinct whorls.—Cyclic planes of a cone of the second order, the two planes through one of the axes which are parallel to the planes of the circular section of the cone.—Cyclic region, in geom., a region within which a closed line can be drawn in such a manner that it cannot shrink indefinitely without passing out of the region.

II. n. A cyclic poem.

The whole multitudinous people, divine and human, of the whole Greek cyclic seem to me as if sculptured in a half relief upon the black marble wall of their fate.

S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 88.

Cyclon (sik'li-kō), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. cyclon, < Gr. κύκλος, circular; see cyclo<sup>1</sup>.] In Latreille's system of classification, the sixth family of tetramerous Coleoptera; a group of phytophagous terrestrial beetles with mostly rounded bodies, whence the name, belonging to the modern group Phytophaga, and to such families as Cassididae, Hispidae, Chrysomelidae, etc. The Cyclinae were divided into three tribes, Cassidinae, Chrysomelinae, and Galerinae.

cyclical (sik'li-ka), a. [Cyclo<sup>1</sup> + -al.] 1. Pertaining to a cycle; cyclic.

Time, cyclical time, was their abstraction of the Delty.

Coleridge.

2. In bot.: (a) Rolled up circularly, as many embryos. (b) Arranged in cycles or whorls; verticillate.—3. In geom., recurrent in successive circles; serially circular; spiral; whorled.

We find in the nautiloid spire a tendency to pass into the cyclical mode of growth.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 457.

Cyclical relation, in logic, a relation such that, in passing from a term to the correlate, and again to the correlate of that correlate, and so on, the original term is again reached.—Cyclical square or cube, in alg., a square or cube which is congruent to its base, especially with a modulus of ten.

Cyclidæ (sik-li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclos, 2, + -idæ.] A family of xiphosurous merostomatous crustaceans, represented by the genus Cyclos. The body is discoid and orbicular; the abdomen has three segments scarcely differentiated from the cephalic shield, and the cephalic limbs are nearly as in the larval stage of species of Lumulus. It is of Carboniferous age.

cyclid (si'kid), n. [F. cyclide, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle; see cyclo<sup>1</sup>, n.] In geom., the envelop of a sphere touching three fixed spheres.

Cyclidina (sik-li-din-i-a), n. pl. [NL., as Cyclidina + -ina.] In Ehrenberg's system (1836), a family of illoricate, ciliated, enterodolous infusorians. See Cyclodinae.

Cyclidium (si-kli-d'i-um), n. [NL. (Müller, 1786), < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + dim. -idium.] A genus of holotrichous infusorians, now referred to the Pleurotrichia, inhabiting both fresh and salt water, as C. glaucoma. This is one of the first animals to appear in hay-infusions in which it often swarms in countless numbers. They are extremely minute, requiring the higher powers of the compound microscope for their examination.

Cyclifera (si-kli-f'e-ra), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + ferre = E. bear<sup>1</sup>.] An order of fishes comprising ganoids with subreticular or cycloid scales: same as Cycloganoidei.

cyclifying (sik'li-fi-ing), a. [Ppr. of cyclify, < L. cyclos, a circle, + -fy.] In geom., reducing to a circular form.—Cyclifying time, the generator of a cyclifying surface.—Cyclifying plane, a tangent plane to a cyclifying surface.—Cyclifying surface, a developable surface in which a twisted curve lies, and which, being developed into a plane, transforms the curve into a circle.

Cyclines (si-kin'e-j), n. pl. [NL. (Dana, 1852), < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + -inae.] A primary division or "legion" of cyclometopous crabs, proposed for the genus Acanthocyclus.

cyclist (si'klist), n. [Cycle<sup>1</sup>, n., + -ist.] 1. One who reckons by cycles, or believes in the cyclic recurrence of certain classes of events; specifically, one who believes in the cyclic character of meteorologic phenomena, and of political and commercial crises, and endeavors to connect them with the cyclic changes of the sun's spots.—2. [Partly as an inclusive abbreviation of bicyclist and tricyclist: see cycle<sup>1</sup>, n., 9.] One who rides a bicycle or a tricycle. Also cyclo.

cyclitis (si-kli'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, any circular body, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the ciliary body.

cyclo-, [NL., etc., cyclo-, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, ring; see cyclo<sup>1</sup>.] An element in words of Greek origin, meaning 'circle.'

Cyclobranchia (si-klo-brang'ki-a), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + βράγχια, gills.] Same as Cyclobranchiata.

cyclobranchian (si-klo-brang'ki-an), n. [Cyclobranchia + -an.] One of the Cyclobranchiata.

Cyclobranchiata (si-klo-brang'ki-a'ta), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of cyclobranchiatus; see cyclobranchiatus.] 1. In De Blainville's system of classification, an order of gastropodous mollusks, characterized by the circular disposition of the gills, represented by the chitons and limpets.

The group as thus constituted is not now generally adopted.—2. A suborder of prosobranchiate gastropods, modified from the original group by the exclusion of the chitons or polyplacophorous mollusks, and consisting only of the limpets or dooglossate gastropods. They are prosobranchiate gastropods with flat, lamellar, foliaceous gills circularly disposed around the foot, under the edge of the mantle; a lingual armature consisting of horny toothed plates (whence the name Dooglossa, applied by Trischel); two kidneys; no external opulatory organs; the foot large and strong, and usually flat and broad; and sometimes a dextral cervical gill. The functional gills are not modified tentacles, the true tentacles of limpets being reduced to mere papillae. See Dooglossa, Patalida.

Also Cyclobranchia.

cyclobranchiate (si-klo-brang'ki-at), a. [NL. cyclobranchiatus; see Cyclobranchia, a circle, + βράγχια, gills.] Having a circle of plaited gills, as a limpet; specifically, having the characters of the Cyclobranchiata.

cyclocephali, n. Plural of cyclocephalus.

cyclocephalic (si'klo-se-fal'ik or -sef'a-lik), a. [Cyclocephalus + -ic.] Pertaining to or resembling a cyclocephalus.

cyclocephalus (si-klo-sef'a-lus), n.; pl. cyclocephali (-li). [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + κεφαλή, head.] 1. In terrol., a monster whose eyes are in contact or united in one.—2. The head of one suffering from hydrocephalus. Dunghison.

Cyclocypetina (si-klo-klip-i'ti-na), n. pl. [NL., < Cycloctypus + -ina.] A group of foraminifera, typified by the genus Cyclocypetina. The test is complanate or lenticular, having a disk of chamberlets disposed in concentric rings or acervular layers (with more or less lateral thickening), double septa, and a system of interseptal canals.

Cyclocypetina (si-klo-klip-i'ti-na), n. pl. [NL., < Cycloctypus + -ina.] A subfamily of Nummulitidae. See Cyclocypetina.

Cyclocypetina (si-klo-klip-i'ti-na), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + L. cypetna, cypetna, a shield.] The typical genus of Cyclocypetina.

cyclocalic (si-klo-sal'ik), a. [Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + καλός, the belly, the intestines, + -ic.] Arranged in coils; coiled: applied to the intestines of birds when thus disposed, in distinction from orthocolic.

cyclode (si'klo-dē), n. [Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + δός, way, path. Invented by Silvester, 1868.] In geom., the *n*th involute of a circle.

Cyclodinae (si-klo-din'e-j), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, circular (see cycloid), + -inae.] In Stein's system of classification (1878), a family of peritrichous infusorians, represented by the genera Mesodinium, Didinium, and Urocentrum.

cyclodinean (si-klo-din'e-an), a. [Cyclodinae + -an.] Of or pertaining to the Cyclodinae.

Cyclodus (si-klo'dus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + δούς (δόνν-) = E. tooth.] A genus of skinks or sand-lizards, of the family Scincidae, having four short 5-toed limbs, thick circular scales, a round tail, and usually eyelids. It is named from the broad spheroidal crowns of the teeth, well adapted for crushing, as shown in the side view of the skull herewith presented. The genus belongs, like most existing lizards, to the division Ctenosaurus or column-skills, having a well-developed Skull of a Member of Cyclodus, entire and hemisected.

cyclogonoid (si-klo-gon-oid), a. and n. I. a. Of or relating to the Cyclogonoides.

II. n. A fish of the order Cyclogonoides.

Cyclogonoides (si-klo-gon-oid-ē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + NL. Gonoides, q. v.] An order of osseous ganoid fishes, with well-developed branchiostegial rays, the bones of the head nearly as in the teleosts, and the scales thin and generally rounded or cycloid. The species are mostly extinct, but one family, Amudae, still survives in the fresh waters of North America. See out under Amudae.

cyclogon (si-klo-jen), n. [Gr. κύκλος, a circle, ring, + -γεν, producing: see -gen.] A dicotyledonous plant with concentric woody circles; an exogen.

cyclograph (si-klo-gráf), n. [Gr. κυκλογραφία, describe a circle, < κύκλος, a circle, + γράφειν, describe, write.] An instrument for describing arcs of circles. It consists of two wheels of unequal diameter adjustable upon a common rod, to which the describing pencil is attached. A greater or less curvature is given by moving the small wheel from or toward the larger.

cycloid (si-kloid), a. and n. [= F. cycloide = Sp. cicloide = Pg. cycloide = It. cicloide, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, < κύκλος, a circle, + είδος, form.] I. a. 1. Resembling a circle; having a circular form. Specifically—2. In tech.: (a) More or less circular, with concentric striations: applied to the scales of certain fishes. See out under scale. (b) Having somewhat circular scales, as a fish; specifically, pertaining to the Cycloides. II. n. 1. A curve generated by a point in the circumference or on a radius of a circle when the circle is rolled along a straight line and kept always in the same plane. When the point is in the circumference of the generating circle the curve is a common cycloid; when it is within the circle the curve is a prolate cycloid; and when it is on a radius produced beyond the circle the curve is a curtate cycloid. The cycloid is of great importance in relation to the theory of wave-motion.

2. In tech., a cycloid fish; a fish with cycloid scales, or one of the Cycloides.—Companion to the cycloid, a curve described by the intersection of a vertical line from the point of contact of a wheel rolling on a horizontal rail with a horizontal line from a fixed point on the circumference of the wheel.

cycloid (si-kloid), a. [Cycloid + -al.] 1. Same as cycloid.—2. Of or pertaining to a cycloid; of the nature of a cycloid; as, the cycloid space (that is, the space contained between the cycloid and its base).

It is doubtful whether, at three years old, La Place could count much beyond ten; and it, at six, he was acquainted with any other cycloid curves than those generated by the trundling of his hoop, he was a prodigy indeed. Swett, Orations, I. 418

Cycloid engine, paddle-wheel, pendulum. See the nouns.

cycloidean (si-kloi-dē-an), a. and n. [Cycloides + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cycloides.

II. n. One of the Cycloides.

Cycloides (si-kloi-dē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, circular: see cycloid.] In L. Agassiz's system of classification, the fourth order of fishes, including those with cycloid scales—that is, scales of the usual type, marked with concentric rings and not enameled or pectinoid. It was contrasted with the orders Ctenoides, Ganoides, and Pisoides. It has proved to be an artificial assemblage of forms, embracing most of the malacopterygian fishes of Cuvier, but also many of his acanthopterygian, and is not now in use.

cyclometer (si-kliom-ē-ter), n. [Gr. κύκλος, circle; μέτρον element not obvious.] In geom., a curve drawn on the surface of a right cylinder so that when the cylinder is developed the curve becomes a circle.

Cyclolebridae (si-klo-lē-brī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, circle (component of Cycloides, q. v.), + NL. Lebrida, q. v.] The family Lebrida, distinguished by having cycloid scales, and thus contrasted with the Ctenolebridae or Pomacentridae, long supposed to be closely related to them.

Cyclolebridae (si-klo-lē-brī-dē), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + λέβη, a stone.] A genus of fossil corals, of the family Fungidae. Lamarck, 1801.

cyclonema (si-kliom-ē-tēr), n. [Gr. κύκλος, circle, + νῆμα, a measure.] I. An instrument for recording the revolutions of a wheel or the distance traversed by a vehicle; an odometer.—2. A circle-square.

Cyclometopa (si-klo-mē-tō-pā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + μέτρον, front, face.]

A superfamily group of brachyurous decapod crustaceans. Its technical characters are a short, broad carapace, rounded anteriorly and laterally produced, without a projecting rostrum, 9 pairs of gills, and the male genital opening on the basal joint of the last pair of thoracic legs. It contains such genera as Cancer, Carcinus, Portunus, Xantho, etc., and corresponds to the more modern group Canceroides. In De Blainville's system of classification the Cyclometopa were characterized as having the carapace very large, arched in front, and narrowed behind; the legs moderately long, and the epistoma very short and transverse. It included the families Canthidae, Portunidae, and Pilumnidae of Leach. It has also been called Canceroides, and divided into the "legions" Cancerines, Cyclonina, Corythoides, and Thelphusina. It includes the principal edible crabs of the northern seas.

cyclometopous (si-klo-mē-tō-pūs), a. [Cyclometopa + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyclometopa.

cyclometric (si-klo-mē-t'rik), a. [= F. cyclométrique; as cyclometry + -ic.] In geom., relating to the division of a circumference into equal parts.

cyclometry (si-kliom-ē-trī), n. [= F. cyclométrie = Sp. ciclometria, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + μέτρον, a measure.] 1. The art of measuring circles; specifically, the attempt to square the circle.

I must tell you, that Sir H. Savile has confuted Joseph Scaliger's cyclometry.

Walton, Due Correction of Hobbes, p. 116

2. The theory of circular functions.

Cyclomyaria (si-kli-mī-ā-rī-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + μύς, muscle, lit. a mouse, = E. mouse. Cf. muscle.] In Claus's classification, an order of free-swimming tunicates or Thaliacea, containing only the family Doliolidae. Their technical characters are: a cask-shaped body, the mouth and atrial opening surrounded by lobes, the mantle delicate, the muscles arranged in closed rings, the dorsal wall of the pharyngeal cavity formed by a branchial lamella pierced with numerous slits, the digestive canal not compressed into a nucleus, the testes and ovaries maturing simultaneously, and development accomplished by a complicated alternation of generations. In the first asexual generation there is a large auditory vesicle on the left side. Claus, Zoology (trans.), II. 108.

cyclomyarian (si-kli-mī-ā-rī-an), a. [Cyclomyaria + -an.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyclomyaria.

cyclonal (si-kli-nāl), a. [= F. cyclonal; as cyclone + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a cyclone; cyclonic.

The cyclonal curvature of the wind orbit is accompanied by a stronger gradient and greater angular deviation than is the anti cyclonal curvature.

cyclone (si-kli-on), n. [= F. cyclone = Sp. ciclón, < Gr. κύκλος, whirling round, ppx. of κύκλω, κύκλω, go round, whirl round, as wind or water, move in a circle, surround, < κύκλος, a circle: see cyclo.] 1. The term introduced into meteorology by Piddington, in 1840, as a general name for the class of extensive storms at sea that were at that time supposed to be characterized by the revolution of air in circles about a calm center.—2. Any atmospheric movement, gentle or rapid, general or local, on land or at sea, in which the wind blows spirally around and in toward a center. In the northern hemisphere the cyclonic motion is usually counter-clockwise, and in the southern hemisphere it is clockwise. Cyclones generally develop into cyclonic storms. See anticyclone.

Cyclones occur at all hours of the day and night, whereas whirlwinds and tornadoes show a diurnal period as distinctly marked as any in meteorology. Finally, cyclones take place under conditions which involve unequal atmospheric pressure or densities at the same heights of the atmosphere, to be located in the geographical distribution of temperature and humidity;—whirlwinds occur where for the time the air is unusually warm or moist, and where, consequently, temperature and humidity diminish with height at an abnormally rapid rate. Cyclones are thus phenomena resulting from a disturbance of the equilibrium of the atmosphere considered horizontally, but whirlwinds and tornadoes have their origin in a vertical disturbance of atmospheric equilibrium.

3. Popularly, a tornado (such as occur in the Western States), or any destructive storm. See tornado, waterspout, and whirlwind. [U. S.]

cyclone-pit (si-kli-on-pit), n. On the prairies and plains of the western United States, a pit or underground room made for refuge from a tornado or cyclone.

Cycloneura (si-kli-nū-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, circle, + νῆμα, nerve.] A division of Hydrosora, corresponding to Hydromedusae: exposed to Troposora. Bonar.

cycloneural (si-kli-nū-rāl), a. [Cycloneura + -al.] Having a complete nerve-ring, as a hydromedusan; specifically, of or pertaining to the Cycloneura; not toponeural.

cyclonic (si-kli-on'ik), a. [Cyclone + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or of the nature of a cyclone: as, a cyclonic area; cyclonic action; "the cyclonic motion in sun-spots," Young.

cyclonically (si-kli-on'ī-kal-ī), adv. In the manner of a cyclone; like a cyclone.

cyclonoscope (si-kli-nō-skōp), n. [Gr. κύκλος, a circle (see cyclone), + σκοπεῖν, view.] A hurricane-indicator; an apparatus (devised by Padre Vines, S. J., Havana) consisting of an outer card with compass-points and an inner movable card with lines, to show the direction of motion of the various atmospheric currents constituting the circulation of a tropical hurricane. The apparatus, when properly oriented and adjusted, aids an observer in detecting the existence of a hurricane in his vicinity and the bearing of its center.

Cyclopæcia (si-kli-pē-ā-sē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclope, 2, + -acea.] A superfamily group of entomostracous crustaceans, taking name from the genus Cyclope: an inexact synonym of Copepoda.

cyclopædia, cyclopædic, etc. See cyclopedic, etc.

cyclope (si-kliōp), a. [L. Cyclopes: see cyclopean.] Having or using a single eye; cyclopean. [Poetical.]

Even as the patient watchers of the night,—
The cyclope gleamers of the fruitful skies,— Show the wide misty way where heaven is white
All paved with suns that dazzle our wondering eyes.
W. Holmes, To Christian Gottfried Krumpholtz

cyclopean (si-kliō-pē-an), a. [= F. cyclopéen, < L. Cyclops, < Gr. Κύκλωπες, Cyclopean (architectures), < Κύκλωψ, Cyclops.] Of or pertaining to, or exhibiting the characteristics of, any of the legendary Cyclopes. [Commonly with a capital when used with direct reference to these beings; as, Cyclopean architecture. See below.]

Specifically—(a) Having a single eye in the middle of the forehead; in zool., having a median and apparently or actually single eye. This state may be normal and permanent, as in some of the crustaceans; or normal and marking a stage of development; or monstrous, from defect of growth in the parts concerned, whereby the eyes are not separated. It occurs, for example, occasionally in the pig. (b) Single and situated in the middle of the forehead, as an eye.

A true, mean, cyclopean eye would be slightly to the right of the median line.

(c) Vast; gigantic; applied to an early style of masonry, sometimes initiated in later ages, constructed of stones either unworked or more or less irregularly shaped and fitted together, usually polygonal, but in some more recent examples approaching regular horizontal courses, and often presenting joints of very perfect workmanship. Such masonry was fabled to be the work of the Cyclopes. It is remarkable for the immense size of the stones commonly employed, and was most frequently used for the walls of cities and fortresses. The walls of Tyria, near Naxos, in Greece, mentioned by Homer, are a good specimen of Cyclopean masonry. The remains of these walls consist of three courses, of which the stones, measuring from 6 to 9 feet long, from 3 to 4 feet wide, and from 2 to 3 feet deep, are rudely shaped, irregular masses piled on one another. Examples of Cyclopean work occur in Greece, Italy, Asia Minor, and elsewhere. The more primitive Cyclopean masonry in Greece, roughly built of stones entirely unworked, the spaces between the larger stones being filled with smaller ones, is often termed Alieus.

cyclopæd (si-kliō-pēd), n. [Cyclopædia.] A cyclopædia.

Peter Lombard's scholastic cyclopædia of divinity.

T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 460.

cyclopædia, cyclopædic (si-kliō-pē-di-ā), n. [Short form of encyclopædia, encyclopædic, q. v.] 1. A book containing accounts of the principal subjects in one branch of science, art, or learning in general: as, a cyclopædia of botany; a cyclopædia of mechanics.—2. In a broader sense, a book comprising accounts of all branches of learning; an encyclopædia. See encyclopædia.

cyclopædic, cyclopædis (si-kliō-pē-di-s or -ped-ik), a. [Cyclopædia, cyclopædic, + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to a cyclopædia.—2. Resembling Cycloids.

The rolling wheel carries three pencils: that at A generates the cycloid proper, that at a the prolate, and that at a' the curtate cycloid.

is on a radius produced beyond the circle the curve is a curtate cycloid. The cycloid is of great importance in relation to the theory of wave-motion.

2. In tech., a cycloid fish; a fish with cycloid scales, or one of the Cycloides.—Companion to the cycloid, a curve described by the intersection of a vertical line from the point of contact of a wheel rolling on a horizontal rail with a horizontal line from a fixed point on the circumference of the wheel.

cycloid (si-kloid), a. [Cycloid + -al.] 1. Same as cycloid.—2. Of or pertaining to a cycloid; of the nature of a cycloid; as, the cycloid space (that is, the space contained between the cycloid and its base).

It is doubtful whether, at three years old, La Place could count much beyond ten; and it, at six, he was acquainted with any other cycloid curves than those generated by the trundling of his hoop, he was a prodigy indeed. Swett, Orations, I. 418

Cycloid engine, paddle-wheel, pendulum. See the nouns.

cycloidean (si-kloi-dē-an), a. and n. [Cycloides + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cycloides.

II. n. One of the Cycloides.

Cycloides (si-kloi-dē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, circular: see cycloid.] In L. Agassiz's system of classification, the fourth order of fishes, including those with cycloid scales—that is, scales of the usual type, marked with concentric rings and not enameled or pectinoid. cyclometer (si-kliom-ē-ter), n. [Gr. κύκλος, circle; μέτρον element not obvious.] In geom., a curve drawn on the surface of a right cylinder so that when the cylinder is developed the curve becomes a circle.

Cyclolebridae (si-klo-lē-brī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, circle (component of Cycloides, q. v.), + NL. Lebrida, q. v.] The family Lebrida, distinguished by having cycloid scales, and thus contrasted with the Ctenolebridae or Pomacentridae, long supposed to be closely related to them.

Cyclolebridae (si-klo-lē-brī-dē), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + λέβη, a stone.] A genus of fossil corals, of the family Fungidae. Lamarck, 1801.

cyclonema (si-kliom-ē-tēr), n. [Gr. κύκλος, circle, + νῆμα, a measure.] I. An instru-

Cyclopean Masonry.—Walls of Amn, in the Troad (From papers of the Archaeol. Inst. of America.)

consist of three courses, of which the stones, measuring from 6 to 9 feet long, from 3 to 4 feet wide, and from 2 to 3 feet deep, are rudely shaped, irregular masses piled on one another. Examples of Cyclopean work occur in Greece, Italy, Asia Minor, and elsewhere. cyclopæd (si-kliō-pēd), n. [Cyclopædia.] A cyclopædia.

Peter Lombard's scholastic cyclopædia of divinity.

T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 460.

cyclopædia, cyclopædic (si-kliō-pē-di-ā), n. [Short form of encyclopædia, encyclopædic, q. v.] 1. A book containing accounts of the principal subjects in one branch of science, art, or learning in general: as, a cyclopædia of botany; a cyclopædia of mechanics.—2. In a broader sense, a book comprising accounts of all branches of learning; an encyclopædia. See encyclopædia.

cyclopædic, cyclopædis (si-kliō-pē-di-s or -ped-ik), a. [Cyclopædia, cyclopædic, + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to a cyclopædia.—2. Resembling a cyclopedia in character or contents; exhaustive: as, cyclopedic treatment of a subject.

cyclopedical, cyclopædical (sī-klop'pē'di-kal or -ped'i-kal), a. Same as cyclopedic.

Cyclopes, n. Plural of Cyclops, 1.

Cyclophis (sī'klop'fis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + φής, a serpent.] A genus of serpents, of the family Colubridæ, containing the familiar and beautiful green-snake of the United States, C. vermiculatus. See green-snake.

Green snake (Cyclophis vermiculatus).

Cyclophoridae (sī-klop'for'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclophorus + -idae.] A family of operculate gastropodous mollusks, typified by the genus Cyclophorus, related to and often merged in Cyclostomidae. They have a depressed shell with circular aperture and a plurilocular operculum. Leading genera are Cyclophorus, Cyclotus, Pomatius, Diplomatina, and Pupina. Also called Cyclotidae.

Cyclophorus (sī'klop'f-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + φός, a bearing = F. bear.] A genus of gastropodous mollusks, typical of the family Cyclophoridae, or referred to the family Cyclotomidae.

Cyclophorus involutus.

cyclopia (sī'klop'pi-ā), n. [NL., < L. Cyclops, < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + πῆν, a foot.] In teratol., a malformation in which the orbits form a single continuous cavity. Also called synophthalmia.

cyclopic (sī'klop'ik), a. [Cyclops + -ic.] [Cap. or i. e., according to use.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling the Cyclopes; cyclopean. Specifically—(a) One-eyed; cyclopean (with see). Hence—(b) Seeing only one part of a subject, one-sided. (c) Gigantic.

Sending a bill of defiance to all physicians, chiropractors, and apothecaries, as so many bold giants, or cyclopic monsters, who daily seek to fight against Heaven by their rebellious drugs and doses! Art of Handmen.

cyclopid (sī'klop'id), n. A member of the Cyclopidae.

Cyclopidae (sī'klop'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclops, 2, + -idae.] A family of minute entomostreous crustaceans, of the gnathostomatous section of Copepoda; so called from their simple single eye. They are mostly fresh-water forms, without any heart, the second pair of antennae jointed and not biramous, the anterior antennae of the male prehensile, and the fifth pair of feet rudimentary. They are extremely prolific, and it is estimated that in one summer a female may become the progenitrix of more than four million descendants. They undergo many transformations before attaining maturity. See under Cyclops.

cyclopine (sī'klop'pin), n. [NL. Cyclopina, a genus of plants (< Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + πῆν, a foot) = E. foot), + -ine.] An alkaloid obtained from plants of the genus Cyclopia.

cyclopite (sī'klop'pit), n. [Cyclopean + -ite.] A crystallized variety of anorthite, occurring in geodes in the dolerite of the Cyclopean Isles or rocks on the coast of Sicily, opposite Acireale.

cycloplegia (sī'klop'pē-ji-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + πῆν, a stroke.] Paralysis of the ciliary muscle of the eye.

Cyclops (sī'klops), n. [= F. Cyclope = Sp. Cyclope = It. Cyclope = Fr. Cyclope = D. G. Cyclope = Dan. Sv. Cyclop, < L. Cyclops, pl. Cyclopes, < Gr. κύκλιος, pl. κύκλινες, (Cyclops, lit. round-eyed, < κύκλιος, a circle, + ὤψ, eye.) 1. Pl. (Cyclopes (sī'klop'pēs) or Cyclops). In Gr. myth. and legend: (a) A giant with but one eye, which was circular and in the middle of the forehead. According to the Hesiodic legend, there were three Cyclopes of the race of Titans, sons of Ixion and Gaia, who forged the thunderbolts of Zeus, Pluto's helmet and Poseidon's trident, and were considered the primal patrons of all smiths. Their workshops were afterward said to be under Mount Etna.

The Cyclops here, which labour at the Trade, Arr. Jealousie, Fear, Madnes, and Despair Convey, The Mistress, Monopoly.

(b) In the Odyssey, one of a race of gigantic, lawless cannibal shepherds in Sicily, under the one-eyed chief Polyphemus. (c) One of a Thracian tribe of giants, named from a king Cyclope, who, expelled from their country, were fabled to have built in their wanderings the great prehistoric walls and fortresses of Greece. See cyclopean.—2. [NL.] In zool., a genus of minute fresh-water copepods, typical of the family Cyclopidae, having a greatly enlarged pair of antennules (the appendages of the second somite of the head), by the vigorous strokes of which they dart through the water as if propelled by oars. In the front of the head there is a heavy black median eye, usually double, but appearing single, whence the name of the genus. Cyclops quadracus is a common water flea of fresh water ponds and ditches. See Copepoda.

3. [i. e.] A copepod of the genus Cyclops.

cyclopterid (sī'klop'tē-rid), n. A fish of the family Cyclopteridae.

Cyclopteridae (sī'klop'ter'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclopterus + -idae.] A family of fishes, represented by the genus Cyclopterus, and adopted by various authors with different limits. See under Cyclopterus. (a) In the old systems it embraced the true Cyclopteridae as well as Liparididae and Gobiocentridae. (b) In another system it includes the true Cyclopteridae and also Liparididae. (c) By Gill and American writers generally it is restricted to Cyclopteridae of a short ventricose form, with short posterior and opposite dorsal and anal fins and a distinct spinous dorsal. The species inhabit the cold seas of the northern hemisphere.

Cyclopterina (sī'klop'ter-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclopterus + -inae.] In Günther's system of classification, the first group of his family Tha coboli, having two separate dorsal fins, and 12 abdominal and 16 caudal vertebrae.

cyclopterine (sī'klop'ter-in), a. and n. 1. a. Of or relating to the Cyclopterina or restricted Cyclopteridae.

2. n. One of the Cyclopterina.

cyclopteroid (sī'klop'tē-roid), a. and n. 1. a. Of or relating to the Cyclopteridae.

2. n. A fish of the family Cyclopteridae or superfamily Cyclopteroidae.

Cyclopteroidae (sī'klop'tē-roi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclopterus + -oidae.] A superfamily of acanthopterygian fishes, distinguished by the development of a suctorial disk resulting from the union of the ventral fins and the fixture of their rays to the pelvic bones. It includes the families Cyclopteridae and Liparididae.

Cyclopterus (sī'klop'tē-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + πτερόν, wing.] A genus of fishes, typical of the family Cyclopteridae. By the older authors it was made to include all forms with an imperfectly ossified skeleton and the ventral fins united in a broad suctorial disk; by later authors it is restricted to the lump fish (C. lumpus) and closely related species.

cyclorama (sī'klop'rā'mē), n. [C. κύκλιος, a circle, + ὥρα, a view, < ὥρα, see.] A representation of a landscape, battle, or other scene, arranged on the walls of a room of cylindrical shape, and so executed as to appear in natural perspective, the spectators occupying a position in the center; a circular panorama.

It is only within a generation that cycloramas have been painted and constructed with a satisfactory degree of mechanical perfection. Appleton's Ann. Cyc., 1886, p. 278.

cycloramic (sī'klop'rā'mik), a. [Cyclorama + -ic.] Relating to or of the nature of a cyclorama.

The laws of cycloramic perspective have been understood for two or three centuries. Appleton's Ann. Cyc., 1886, p. 278.

Cyclorhapha (sī'klop'rā-fā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of cyclorhaphus; see cyclorhaphous.] A prime division of dipterous insects, containing those in which the pupa-case opens curvilinearly: opposed to Orthorhapha, in which the case splits straight. Brauer.

cyclorhaphous (sī'klop'rā-fus), a. [NL. cyclorhaphus, < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + ράφ, a seam, a suture, < ῥάπτω, sew.] Having the pupa-case opening curvilinearly; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyclorhapha.

Cyclosauria (sī'klop-sā'rē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + σαύρος, lizard.] A division of lacertilians or lizards. They have a short thick tongue, scarcely extensible; a round pupil; a long tail with the anus not terminal; 2 or 4 short feet, or none; the body either lacertiform or serpentine; the back with large scales; and the belly with scales not overlapping and arranged in cross-bands. The division contains the Chalcidæ, Zonuridæ, and Reptosidæ (to which some add the Monitors, etc.). The group is by some made a family, Phrynosauria, of a suborder Bremidina.

cyclosaurian (sī'klop-sā'-ri-an), a. and n. [Cyclosauria + -ian]. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyclosauria.

2. n. One of the Cyclosauria.

cycloscope (sī'klop-skōp), n. [C. κύκλιος, a circle, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An apparatus invented by McLeod and Clarke for measuring velocities of revolution at a given instant. It consists essentially of a revolving ruled cylinder that may be examined through an opening partially closed by a tuning-fork vibrating at a known rate. The observation depends on the persistence of vision, and when the intermittent appearance of the ruled lines, seen past the vibrating fork, becomes continuous, an index shows upon a scale the rate of the revolution of the cylinder.

cyclosis (sī'klop'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a surrounding, < ἀκυκλῶν, surround, move around, < κύκλιος, a circle; see cycle, n.] In zool., physiol., and bot., circulation, as of blood or other fluid: in zool., especially applied to the currents in which circulate the finely granular protoplasmic substances in Protozoa, Infusoria, etc., as within the body of members of the genus Paramecium, and the pseudopodia of foraminifera; in botany, originally, to the movement occasionally observable in the latex of plants, now to the streaming movement of protoplasm within the cell.

It is by the contractility of the protoplasmic layer that the various cytolyses . . . is carried on within the plant-cell. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 224.

cyclospermous (sī'klop-spēr'mus), a. [C. κύκλιος, a circle, + σπέρμα, seed, < σπένω, I sow.] In bot., having the embryo coiled about the central albumen, as the seeds of Argemone.

Cyclostoma (sī'klop'tō-mā), n. [NL., fem. sing. (in sense 2 neut. pl.) of cyclostomus; see cyclostomus.] 1. The typical genus of the family Cyclostomidae: so called from the circular aperture of the shell. Very different limits have been given to it, the old writers including not only the true Cyclostoma, but also the Phrynosoma and Pomatius, while by most modern writers it is limited to those with a calcareous paracardial opening flattened and having an eccentric nucleus. The species are numerous, they live in damp places. C. elegans is an example. See under Cyclostomidae. Also Cyclostomus.

2. [Used as a plural.] The cyclostomatous vertebrates, or myxozoa.

Cyclostomata (sī'klop-tō'mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of cyclostomatus; see cyclostomatous.]

1. A division of gymnomatous polyzoans having tubular cells, partially free or entirely connate, a terminal opening with a movable lip, and no avicularia nor vibracula: opposed to Chilostomata and Stenostomata. It is subdivided into Articulata or Radiata (family Crasidia), and Inarticulata or Incrustata, containing the rest of the families. 2. In Günther's system of classification, a sub-class of fishes having the following technical characters: the skeleton cartilaginous and notochordal, without ribs and without real jaws; skull not separate from the vertebral column; no limbs; gills in the form of fixed sacs without branchial arches, 6 or 7 in number on each side; one nasal aperture only; mouth circular or sucker-like; and heart without bulbus arteriosus. Also called Cyclostomi, Cyclostomia, Marsipobranchii, and Monorhina.

Of the thirty three cyclostomate forms, thirteen had previously been known in a fossil state. Schenck, IX 380.

cyclostomatous (sī'klop-tō'mā-tus), a. [NL. cyclostomatus, < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + στόμα, mouth.] Having a circular oral aperture, or round mouth. Specifically—(a) Pertaining to the polyan Cyclostoma. (b) Pertaining to the round-mouthed fishes, the lampreys and hags. The usual form in ichthyology is cyclostomus.

cyclostome (sī'klop-tōm), a. and n. [NL. cyclostomus; see cyclostomatous.] 1. a. Same as cyclostomatous.

The cyclostome fishes, possessed of cerebral ganglia that are tolerably manifest, lead us to the ordinary fishes, in which these ganglia, individually much larger, form a cluster of masses, or rudimentary brain.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 8.

II. n. 1. A fish of the order Cyclostomi; a maripobranch; a monorhine; a lamprey or hag.—2. A gastropod of the family Cyclostomidae.

Cyclostomi (si-klos'tō-mī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of cyclostomus; see cyclostomus.] In Cuvier's system of classification, the second family of his second order, Chondropterygii branchiis fixis, with the mouth formed into a sucker, containing the lampreys and hags, or the cyclostomous, monorhine, or maripobranchiate fishes; a synonym of Maripobranchii.

cyclostomid (si-klos'tō-mid), n. A gastropod of the family Cyclostomidae.

Cyclostomidae (si-klos'tō-mī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclostoma + -idae.] A family of tsniglossate gastropods to which different limits have been assigned. (a) By the old writers it was extended to all the operculate land-shells. (b) Later it was limited to those with a circular aperture to the shell. (c) By most modern conchologists it is restricted to forms with comparatively narrow lateral teeth bearing several cusps.

Cyclostoma elegans

are numerous in tropical and subtropical countries, and a few, as Cyclostoma elegans, extend into temperate regions. They are chiefly found in forests and damp places. The under surface of the foot is impressed by a longitudinal groove, and the sides are alternately moved in progression, while the long rostrum is used for pulling forward.

Cyclostominae (si-klos'tō-mī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclostoma + -inae.] A subfamily of Cyclostomidae, containing the typical species, and contrasting with the subfamilies Cistulinae, Lacineinae, and Realinae.

cyclostomous (si-klos'tō-mus), a. [NL., cyclostomus, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + στόμα, mouth.] Having a round mouth, as a lamprey, or a round aperture of the shell, as a cyclostomid; specifically, in ichth., pertaining to the Cyclostomus. Also cyclostomatic, cyclostome.

Cyclostomus (si-klos'tō-mus), n. [NL.; see cyclostomus.] Name as (cyclostoma, 1).

Cyclostrema (i-klos'trē-mā), n. [NL., improp. for Cyclostoma, < Gr. κύκλος, circle, + τρήμα, hole.] A genus of gastropods, typical of the family Cyclostremidae.

Cyclostremidae (si-klos'trēm-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclostrema + -idae.] A family of rhipidoglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Cyclostrema. They have oiliated filiform tentacles, lateral chitinous appendages, a wide median tooth and four narrow teeth on each side, and marginal teeth with denticulated borders; the shell is depressed, umbilicated, un-nacreous, and white. The species are of small size and found in almost all seas.

cyclostylar (si-klos'tī-lār), a. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + στυλος, a pillar, style, + -ar.] In arch., consisting of a circular range of columns; monopteral.

cyclostyle (si-klos'tī-l), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + στυλος, a pen.] An apparatus for making duplicate copies of letters, circulars, etc., written on sensitized paper with a pen of peculiar make, or with a typewriter. The first copy is used as an impression-plate, and inked with an inking-roller to produce subsequent copies.

cyclostystem (si-klos'tī-sēm), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + σῑστημα, system.] The circular arrangement of the pores of certain hydrocoral-line acleophs (the stylasterids), simulating the calicular systems of anthozoan corals in appearance. Moseley, 1881.

cyclothure (si-klos'thūr), n. An animal of the genus Cyclothurus; a two-toed ant-eater.

Two-toed Ant-eater (Cyclothurus didactylus).

Cyclothurus (si-klos'thūr-si-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclothurus + -inae.] A subfamily of South American arboricole ant-eaters, of the family Myrmecophagidae; the two-toed ant-eaters of the single genus Cyclothurus. The first, fourth, and fifth digits of the fore paws are so reduced that only two are visible externally, and the inner digit of the hind foot is likewise rudimentary. These ant-eaters live in trees and resemble sloths.

cyclothurine (si-klos'thūr-in), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to the subfamily Cyclothurinae. 2. n. One of the Cyclothurinae; a cyclothure.

Also written cyclothurine.

Cyclothurus (si-klos'thūr-rus), n. [NL., for Cyclothurus, < Gr. κύκλος, round (see Cyclo-), + οὐρά, a tail.] The typical and only genus of the subfamily Cyclothurinae, containing the little two-toed ant-eater of Brazil, C. didactylus, and a species of Costa Rica, C. dorsalis. See Cyclothurinae.

cycloid (si-klot'id), n. A gastropod of the family Cycloidea.

Cycloidea (si-klot'id-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclo- + -idae.] A family of phaneropneumous tsniglossate gastropods. The eyes are situated at the outer bases of the tentacles; the outer lateral teeth of the radula are little differentiated from the others, there are 10 jaws; and the shell is spiral with a circular aperture, closable by a multijudral operculum. Name as Cyclophoridae.

cyclotomic (si-klos'tō-mīk), a. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, circle, + τομή, a cutting, + -ic.] In geom., pertaining to the theory of the division of the circumference of a circle into aliquot parts.—Cyclotomic divisor. See divisor.

cyclothurine, Cyclothurus. See cyclothurine, (Cyclothurus).

Cyclopus (si-klos'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, rounded, + πους, make round, + -us, a circle.] A genus of gastropodous mollusks, of the family Cyclophoridae, or giving the name Cyclo- to the same group.

Cyclura (si-klos'thūr), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + οὐρα, tail.] A genus of lizards, of the family Iguanidae. C. lophoma is the great iguana of Jamaica, with a long serrate dorsal crest. C. acanthura is the spine-tailed lizard of Lower California. C. teres, of the same region, is the smooth-backed lizard.

cyclus (si-klos'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle; see cycle.] 1. Pl. cycli (si-kli). Same as cycle, 5.

Gonzalo de Córdoba, "the Great Captain," . . . produced an impression on the Spanish nation hardly equalled since the earlier days of that great Moorish conqueror, whose heroes Gonzalo seems appropriately to close up Tucknor, Span. Lit., 1 181

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of fossil crustaceans of uncertain character.

cydariform (si-dar'i-fōrm), a. [NL., < Cydarum (< Gr. κύδαρος), a kind of ship, + forma, shape.] In entom., approaching the form of a globe, but truncated on two opposite ends: applied to joints of the palpi, etc.

cyderi, n. See cider.

Cydippe (si-dip'i), n. [NL., < L. Cydippe, < Gr. Κυδῖπη, in myth, a fem. name, a Nereid, etc.; appar. < κύδος, glory, renown, + ἵππος, fem. ἵππη, horse.] 1. In zool., the typical genus of ctenophorans of the family Cydidipidae, having retractile filiform fringed tentacles, and a transparent colorless gelatinous body, divided radially into eight parts by the ctenophores. (The member of the genus, C. pallas, is a very beautiful object, and is common in the seas around Great Britain.) The body is globular in shape, and adorned with eight bands of cilia, serving as its means of locomotion and presenting brilliant rainbow hues. From the body are pendent two long filaments, to which are attached numerous shorter threads, and which can be protruded and retracted at will. Also called Neurobrachia, and formerly referred to a family Callianthidae. See out under Ctenophora.

2. A genus of spiders. Enc. O. P. Cambridge, 1840.—3. In entom., a genus of beetles.

cydippid (si-dip'id), n. A ctenophoran of the family Cydidipidae.

Cydidipidae (si-dip'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cydippe, 1, + -idae.] A family of sacrate ctenophorans, typified by the genus Cydippe.

Cydonia (si-dō-nī-ā), n. [NL., < L. cydonia, a quince (> ult. E. quince, quince, q. v.), prop. pl. (sc. mala, apples) of Cydonium, adj.; Gr. κύδων (sc. μήλον, apple), a quince, κύδωνια, a quince-tree, neut. and fem. of κύδωνος, adj., pertaining to κύδωνια, L. Cydonia, a town of Crete, now Canea.] 1. A rosaceous genus of plants, including the quince, etc., now referred to Pyrus.—2. In entom., a genus of ladybirds, family Coccinellidae. Mulsant.

cydonian (si-dō-nīn), n. [NL., < Cydonia, 1, + -ian.] The mullage of quince-seeds.

cydonium (si-dō-nī-um), n. [See Cydonia.] Quince-seed.

cydiagnosis (si-dī-si-og-nō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύδιος, pregnancy, + γνῶσις, knowledge.] Diagnosis of pregnancy. Dunghison.

cydiology (si-dī-si-ō-lō-jī), n. [NL., < Gr. κύδιος, pregnancy (see cygnus), + -λογία, < λόγος, say; -ology.] In physiol., the science which treats of gestation or pregnancy.

cyesis (si-dē-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύειν, pregnancy, < κύειν, be pregnant.] Pregnancy; conception. Dunghison.

cygneous (sig'nē-us), a. [NL., < L. cygnus, cygnus, a swan; see cygnus.] In biology, curved like a swan's neck. Brathwaite.

cygnet (sig'net), n. [Formerly cygnet, < OF. cygnet, equiv. to cygne, cygneau, dim. of cygne, F. cygne = Fr. cygne = It. cigno, a swan (cf. OF. cygne = Sp. cigno, OPg. cirne = Olt. cecino, It. cecero, a swan, < ML. cecinnus, cicinnus, a corruption of L. cygnus), < L. cygnus, often written cygnus, < Gr. κύων, a swan, prob. redupl. from √ κύω, **kav*, sound, = L. canere, sing. From the same root come L. cicoma, a stork, and E. hen. See chant, chant, hen.] A young swan; specifically, in her., a small swan. Swans, when more than one are borne, are commonly called cygnets, though the representation is exactly the same as that of the swan so called.

So doth the swan her downy cygnets save,
Keeping them phibonci underneath her wings.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 2.

Cygnus royal, in her., a term for a bearing more properly blazoned swan argent ducally gorged and chained or—that is, having a duke's coronet around its neck and a chain attached thereto. Hugh Clark.

Cygninae (sig-nī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cygnus, 1, + -inae.] A subfamily of lamellirostral natatorial birds, of the duck family, Anatidae; the swans. They have the longest neck of any birds of this family, the vertebrae being very numerous (up to 26), the tail is short and many feathered, the tarsus is reticulate; the lores are naked, the bill is high at the base, and sometimes tuberculate, with median nostrils; the feet are large; the middle toe and claw are longer than the tarsus; and the hallux is simple. The legs are set far back, so that the gait is constrained, but in the water the swans are proverbially elegant and graceful. There are 8 or 10 species, of various countries, chiefly of the genus Cygnus. See swan.

cygning (sig'nin), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cygninae.

Cygnopsis (sig-nop'sis), n. [NL. (Brandt, 1836), < L. cygnus, a swan, + Gr. όψις, view, appearance.] A genus of geese, of the subfamily Anserinae and family Anatidae; so called from their Chinese Goose (Cygnopsis cygnoides).

swan-like appearance. The type and only species is the Chinese goose, C. cygnoides, common in domestication.

Cygnus (sig'nus), n. [NL., < L. cygnus, prop. cygnus, a swan; see cygnus.] 1. The typical genus of the subfamily Cygninae, formerly conterminous with it, but now including all the white swans, or even restricted to those which have a tubercle on the bill, as the mute swan of Europe, (Cygnus olor). C. muscus is the European whooping swan, or hooper. It belongs to the subgenus (Nor), as do the two American swans, the whistler, (Cygnus (Nor) columbianus), and the trumpeter, (Cygnus (Nor) buinator). See swan.

2. An ancient northern constellation representing a bird called a swan by Ovid and others, and now always so considered.

The Constellation Cygnus—1 from Ptolemy's description

Cylindrina (sil'lik-nā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, a small cup, < κύλις (κύλικ-), a cup.] A genus of tectibranchiate opisthobranchiate gastropods, of the family Turbellidae or Bullidae, or made type of a family Cylindrinidae, having a strong cylindrical shell, with narrow aperture. There are numerous species.

Cylindroid (sil'lik-nid), n. A gastropod of the family Cylindrinidae.

Cylindroides (sil'lik-ni-dō), n. pl. [NL., < Cylindrina + -ides.] A family of gastropods, of which the genus Cylindrina is typical. The radula has multisetorial teeth, of which the central are small, the lateral large and unciform, and the marginal small and unciform.

Cylindrostegites (sil'lik-kō-mas'ti-jēs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cup, + στέγη, a whorl, scourge.] A group of choanoflagellate infusorians or collar-bearing monads, with a well-marked collar around the base of the flagellum, including such genera as Salpingoeca and Codonononga. Butschli.

Cylindrotomy (sil'lik-kōt'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. κύλινδρος, a cup, + τμήσις, cutting, < τέμνω, cut.] In surgery, division of the ciliary muscle, as in glaucoma. Dungsloot.

Cylindrosoma (sil'lik-kō-zō'h), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cup, + σῶμα, animal.] Same as Cylindrosoma.

Cylinder (sil'in-dēr), n. [Early mod. E. also cylindur, cylindre; in ME. in form chylindre, a cylindrical sun-dial; < OF. cylindre, F. cylindre = Sp. It. cilindro = Pg. cylindro, < L. cylindrus, a cylinder, a roller, a leveler, < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cylinder, a roller, roll, < κύλινδρος, roll, κύλινδρος, roll, see cyclic. Doubtful of cylindroid, q. v.] 1. In geom.: (a) A solid which may be conceived as generated by the revolution of a rectangle about one of its sides: specifically called a right cylinder. The side of the generating rectangle forms the axis of the cylinder, and the adjacent sides generate circles which form the bases of the cylinder. (b) By extension, any surface generated by a right line moving parallel to itself.

Right Cylinder

A cylindrical surface is a curved surface generated by a moving straight line which continually touches a given curve, and in all of its positions is parallel to a given fixed straight line not in the plane of the curve. A solid bounded by a cylindrical surface and two parallel planes is called a cylinder. Chauvout

2. In mech.: (a) That chamber of a steam-engine in which the force of steam is exerted on the piston. See steam-engine. (b) The barrel of an air-pump. (c) A hollow metallic roller forming part of certain printing-machines. In cylinder presses the cylinder is used only for giving the impression. See cylinder-press. In type revolving presses there are type-cylinders and impression-cylinders; the former on which the forms of type or stereotype plates are secured, revolve against the latter in the opposite direction. (d) The bore of a gun. (e) That part of a revolver which contains the chambers for the cartridges. (f) The central well around which a winding staircase is carried. (g) The body of a pump. (h) In a loom, a revolving part which receives the cards. In the Jacquard loom it is a square prism revolving on a horizontal axis. (i) In a carding-machine, a clothed barrel larger than an urchin or a doffer. See cut under carding-machine. (j) In an electrical machine, a barrel of glass. (k) In ordnance, a wooden bucket in which a cartridge is carried from the magazine to the gun. E. H. Knight. (l) A garden- or field-roller. E. H. Knight. (m) In aug., a cylindrical or somewhat barrel-shaped stone, bearing a cuneiform inscription or a carved design, worn by the Babylonians, Assyrians, and kindred peoples as a seal and amulet. Great numbers of such cylinders have been found, and also of Phœnician imitations of them.—4. An old portable timepiece of the class of sun-dials.

By my chilindre it is prime of daye.
Chaucer, Shipman's Tale, l. 206.

5. [cap.] In conch., a genus of gastropods: same as Oliva. Fabricius, 1823. Charge-cylinder, the part of the bore of a cannon occupied by the charge.—Double-acting cylinder, an engine-cylinder in which the stroke of the piston is effective in each direction, instead of only in one direction, as in the single-acting cylinder.—Forming-cylinder, in a paper-making machine, the cylinder on which the pulp is collected and formed into a soft web preparatory to drying and hardening.—Oblique cylinder. See oblique.—Oscillating cylinder, an engine-cylinder which rocks on trunnions, and the piston rod of which connects directly to the crank.—Vacant cylinder, the portion of the bore of a cannon left free in front of the charge.

Cylinder-bit (sil'in-dēr-bit), n. See half-round bit, under bit.

Cylinder-bore (sil'in-dēr-bōr), n. A gun the bore of which is of a uniform diameter throughout.

Cylinder-bore (sil'in-dēr-bōr), r. t. and i.; pret. and pp. cylindered, cylindered. To bore, as a gun-barrel, in such a manner that the diameter of the bore is uniform throughout.

Cylinder-car (sil'in-dēr-kār), n. A hollow cylinder for carrying freight, with wheel-ends adapted to run on a railroad-track. The cylinder rolls with its load, thus doing away with the use of axles. E. H. Knight.

Cylinder-cock (sil'in-dēr-kok), n. A cock at the end of a steam-cylinder, through which water of condensation may be blown out, or through which steam may be blown in for warming up the cylinder. For the first purpose it is sometimes made automatic, and often called a safety cylinder-cock.

Cylinder-cover (sil'in-dēr-kuv'er), n. 1. A jacket or lagging placed about a steam-cylinder, to prevent radiation of heat.—2. In steam-engines, the cover secured by bolts to a flange round the top of a cylinder, so as to make it steam-tight.

Cylinder-desk (sil'in-dēr-desk), n. A writing-desk with a top somewhat cylindrical in shape, which can be pushed back to allow the desk to be used, or brought forward and locked. Also called a roll-top desk.

Cylinder-engine (sil'in-dēr-en'jin), n. In paper-making, a machine in which the pulp is formed in a sheet upon a cylinder and delivered as a web to the dryers.

Cylinder-escapement (sil'in-dēr-es-kāp'ment), n. An escapement for watches invented by Graham, corresponding to the dead-beat escapement in clocks.

Cylinder-face (sil'in-dēr-fās), n. In engines, the flat part of a steam-cylinder on which a slide-valve moves.

Cylinder-gage (sil'in-dēr-gā), n. A cast-iron hollow cylinder, from 3 to 5 calibers in length, accurately turned on the exterior, and used to verify the accuracy of the finished bore of a gun.

Cylinder-glass (sil'in-dēr-glās), n. Glass blown into the form of a cylinder, then split, and flattened into a sheet. The quality is superior to that of crown-glass. See broad glass, under broad.

Cylinder-grinder (sil'in-dēr-grin'dēr), n. A machine-tool with automatic traverse-feed for finishing cylindrical gages, such as those of gun-bore. E. H. Knight.

Cylinder-mill (sil'in-dēr-mil), n. A grinding-mill in which the action of rollers is substituted for that of face-stones. E. H. Knight.

Cylinder-milling (sil'in-dēr-mil'ing), n. See milling.

Cylinder-port (sil'in-dēr-pōrt), n. One of the openings through which steam passes into the cylinder of a steam-engine.

Cylinder-powder (sil'in-dēr-pou'dēr), n. Gunpowder the charcoal for which is prepared by distillation in cylindrical iron retorts.

Cylinder-press (sil'in-dēr-pres), n. A printing-machine in which impression is made by a cylinder rotating over a sliding flat bed-plate which contains the form of types or plates. In the drum-cylinder press there is one cylinder of large size, making but one revolution to the forward and backward movement of the bed-plate; in other forms the cylinder makes two or more revolutions for each impression. In the step-cylinder press the cylinder stops its rotation soon after the impression is taken. The double-cylinder press has two cylinders, and prints an impression on the backward as well as the forward movement of the bed-plate. The name cylinder-press is technically applied only to presses or machines in which the impression-cylinder prints upon a flat surface. Printing-machines that are constructed to print from plates or types fastened on a cylinder are known distinctively as type-revolving presses, and specifically as rotary, web, or sun-and-planet presses.

Cylinder-small (sil'in-dēr-smal), n. A small of the genus Cylindrella; a cylindrellid.

Cylinder-snake (sil'in-dēr-snāk), n. An ophiidian of the family Cylindrophidii or Uropelidae.

Cylinder-staff (sil'in-dēr-stāf), n. An instrument used in the inspection of ordnance to measure the length of the bore. Farrow, Mil. Encey.

Cylinder-tape (sil'in-dēr-tāp), n. In a cylinder printing-press, a tape running on the impression-cylinder, beneath the edge of the paper, to remove the sheet from the cylinder after impression. E. H. Knight.

Cylinder-wrench (sil'in-dēr-rench), n. A form of wrench adapted to grasp cylindrical rods or tubes; a pipe-wrench. E. H. Knight.

Cylindraceous (sil'in-dēr-āshius), a. [= F. cylindraceus; as cylinder + -aceous.] Somewhat or nearly cylindrical.

Cylindrella (sil'in-dēr-ēl'), n. [NL., < L. cylindrus, cylinder, + dim. -ella.] A genus of gophillous gastropods, of the family Cylindrellidae, called cylindrella from the cylindrical shape of the shell. There are many species, of the warmer parts of America. Pfeiffer, 1840.

1. Cylindrella brevis. 2. Cylindrella elegans. (About twice natural size.)

Cylindrellid (sil'in-dēr-ēl'id), n. A gastropod of the family Cylindrellidae.

Cylindrellidae (sil'in-dēr-ēl'id-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Cylindrella + -idae.] An American family of pulmonate gastropods, typified by the genus Cylindrella, the cylindrella-snails. The shell is cylindrical and many whorled, the last whorl usually detached from the rest and having a chelular mouth. The animal has a thin jaw with oblique folds, and the teeth of the radula are peculiar, the central being very narrow, the lateral having the internal and median cusps confluent, and the marginal resembling the lateral in miniature, or rudimentary. Over 200 species are known, most of which are inhabitants of the West Indian islands.

Cylindrenchyma (sil'in-dēr-ēng'ki-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cylinder, + χυμα, an infusion, < ἵκνω, infuse, < ἐν, in, + χύω, pour.] In bot., tissue composed of cylindrical cells, such as that of plants of the genus Conifera, and of many hairs, etc.

Cylindric, cylindrical (sil'in-dēr-ik, -dri-kal), a. [= F. cylindrique = Sp. cilindrico = Pg. cilindrico = It. cilindrico, < NL. **cylindrus*, < Gr. κύλινδρος, cylindrical, < κύλινδρος, cylinder.] Having the form of a cylinder, or partaking of its properties. — Cylindrical boiler, a steam-boiler made in the shape of a cylinder, simple in construction, and admitting of greater resistance to the lateral action of the causes of displacement than most others, although more expensive in the matter of fuel. — Cylindrical bone, in anat., a long bone, as a thigh-bone or humerus, with a more or less cylindrical hollow shaft of compact tissue, enclosing a medullary cavity, and having cancellous tissue at each end. — Cylindrical lens or mirror, a lens or mirror having one or two cylindrical surfaces. Cylindrical lenses are used in spectacles for the correction of astigmatism. — Cylindrical saw, a saw in the form of a cylinder, with the edge of the open end cut in saw teeth; a crown-saw, used for cutting staves, felloes, etc., and in surgery. Also called barrel-saw, drum-saw, tub-saw. See cut under crown-saw. — Cylindrical surface, a surface generated by a right line moving parallel to itself. — Cylindrical valve, a valve of cylindrical form on an oscillating axis, serving to open and close ports in the cylindrical case which forms its seat. E. H. Knight. — Cylindrical vaulting (properly semi-cylindrical vaulting), in arch., the most ancient mode of true vaulting. Also called a segmental, barrel, tunnel, or ovoid-vault. It is a plain half-cylinder, without either groins or ribs, or divided into bays by arcs doubleaux, which are usually of square or semicircular section.

Cylindrically (sil'in-dēr-ik-kal-ē), adv. In the manner or shape of a cylinder.

Cylindricity (sil'in-dēr-ik-tē), n. [= F. cylindricité; as cylindric + -ité.] The character or state of being cylindrical; cylindrical form; as, imperfect cylindricity.

cylindricule (si-lin'dri-kül), n. [NL. as if cylindriculus, dim. of L. cylindrus, a cylinder: see cylinder.] A small cylinder. Owen.

cylindriciform (si-lin'dri-för-m), a. [= F. cylindriciforme; < L. cylindrus, a cylinder, + forma, shape.] Having the form of a cylinder; shaped like a cylinder.

Cylindrostes (si-lin-dro-s'trës), n. pl. [NL., < L. cylindrus, a cylinder, + rostrum, beak.] In Blyth's system of classification (1849), a superfamily of his Halcyonidae, constituted by the kingfishers, rollers, and bee-eaters, or the families Alecyonidae (or Aleodidae), Coraciidae, and Meropidae.

cylindrocephalic (si-lin'drö-se-fal'ik or si-lin'drö-sef'-i-lik), a. [cylindrocephaly + -ic.] Exhibiting or pertaining to cylindrocephaly.

cylindrocephaly (si-lin'drö-sef'-i-lik), n. [Gr. κύλινδρος, cylinder, + κεφαλή, head.] A long cylindrical configuration of the skull.

cylindroconic, cylindroconical (si-lin-drö-kon'ik, -i-kal), a. [cylindric + conic, -al.] Shaped like a cylinder terminated by a cone.

cylindroconoidal (si-lin'drö-kö-noi'dal), a. [cylindric + conoidal.] Shaped like a cylinder having a conoidal termination.

cylindrocylindrical (si-lin'drö-sil'in'dri-kal), a. [cylindric + cylindrical.] In arch., formed by the intersection of one cylindrical vault with another of greater span and height, springing from the same level: said of an arch. See cross-vaulting.

cylindroid (sil'in-droid), n. and a. [= F. cylindroide = Pg. cylindroide, < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cylinder, + ειδος, form.] 1. n. A solid body bounded by a cylindrical surface cut orthogonally by elliptical bases.—2. a. A conoidal cubic surface whose equation is  $z(x^2 + y^2) = 0$ . [No named by 'Ayley and Ball, 1871.]

II. a. Having the form of a cylinder with equal and parallel elliptical bases.

cylindroidal (sil'in-droi'dal), a. [cylindroid + -al.] Resembling a cylinder; cylindroid.

During the embryonic condition of all vertebrates, the centre of the partition [between the cerebral and visceral tubes] is occupied by an elongated, cellular, cylindroidal mass—the notochord, or chorda dorsalis. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 8

cylindroma (sil'in-drö'mä), n.; pl. cylindromata (-mä-tä). [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cylinder, + ματῆς.] In pathol., a name given to several kinds of tumors. (a) Sarcoma myxomatodes, a sarcoma in which the sarcoma cells have undergone in greater or less part mucous degeneration. (b) Angiosarcoma myxomatodes, a sarcoma in which the mucous degeneration affects the walls of the vessels and the tissue immediately about them. (c) Myxosarcoma, a simple combination of myxomatous and sarcomatous tissue. (d) Cylindroma carcinomatodes, a very rare carcinoma, characterized by the presence of homogeneous hyaline spherules in the cell nests. See carcinoma myxoma, sarcoma.

cylindromatous (sil'in-drom'a-tus), a. [cylindroma + -ous.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a cylindroma.

cylindrometric (si-lin'drö-met'rik), a. [Gr. κύλινδρος, a cylinder, + μετρον, a measure.] Pertaining to a scale used in measuring cylinders.

cylindro-ogival (si-lin'drö-ö-jiv'al), a. [= F. cylindro-ogival; as cylindric + ogival.] Having the form of a cylindrical body with an ogival head.

Oylindrophids (sil'in-drof'i-dë), n. pl. [NL., short for Oylindrophididae, < Oylindrophus (drophid-) + -idae.] A family of harmless ophiurians or reptiles, typified by the genus Oylindrophis, without poison-fangs, with a very small head, the mouth not distensible, and the tail short and conical. They have a rudimentary pelvis, and a pair of anal spurs furnished by the condensed epimeria of the rudimentary hind limbs; the teeth are small, and there are palatine teeth; the quadrate bone is fixed, and there is no distinct mastoid. Besides Oylindrophis, the family contains the genus Ophis or Tortrix, whence it is some times named Tortricidae. With the family Tropetidae it constitutes a suborder Anguillomata, or is brought under Ophiderontia with Tropetidae.

Oylindrophis (si-lin'drö-fis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, cylinder, + φίς, serpent.] A genus of serpents, giving name to the family Oylindrophidae. C. rufa is a Japanese species.

cyliz, n. See lylix.

Oyllecoraria (sil'e-kö-rä-rä-ä), n. pl. [NL.] One of the many divisions of the heteropterous family Phyllorhizidae, containing such genera as Hyalocoris.

Oyllene (si-lë'në), n. [NL., < L. Oyllene, < Gr. ούλλην, the name of a mountain in Arcadia, Greece.] A genus of longicorn beetles, of the family Cerambycidae, which in the form of the body and the style of the markings have a Cyllene punctus. b Cyllene robustus (Natural size)

(Drury) and C. robustus (Forst.), have a black body, banded with narrow transverse or oblique yellow lines, and red legs. The former lives in the hickory and appears in spring, while the latter infests the locust tree and appears in autumn. Both species are, in the larval state, very destructive to the trees they inhabit. Harris, Ins. Inj. to Soc., p. 103

cyma (si'mä), n.; pl. cymæ (-më). [NL. (cf. L. cyma, cuma, a sprout, a hollow sphere), < Gr. κύμα, a wave, a swell, billow, a waved ogee or molding, < κύω, to be pregnant, lit. contain. See cyme] 1. In arch., a member or molding of the cornice, of which the profile is an ogee, or curve of contrary flexure. Of this molding there are two kinds: cyma recta, or Doric cyma (sometimes called half molding), which is concave at the top and convex at the bottom, and cyma reversa, or Ionian cyma, which is convex at the top and concave at the bottom. Both kinds of the cyma are also called ogee. Also written cumi, cuma. 2. In bot., same as cyme.—3. [cap.] [NL.] Same as cuma, 2.

cynagraph (si'ma-gräf), n. [Gr. κύμα, a waved molding, + γράφω, write.] A form of sculpture-copier or pantograph for tracing the outlines of objects in relief, particularly adapted for taking profiles of architectural moldings.

cynaphen (si'ma-fen), n. [Irreg. < Gr. κύμα, a wave, + φαίνω, show.] An apparatus in a telephone for receiving transmitted electric waves.

cymar, n. See amar.

cymatium (si-mä'shi-um), n.; pl. cymatia (-ä). [L., < Gr. κύματιον, a waved molding, < κύμα (-), a wave, etc.: see cyma.] In arch., a cyma; a molding composed of the cyma.

Most of the capitals here are of the Corinthian order, and I took notice of the capitals of some pilasters, consisting of a cymatium two feet, and fluted about a foot long, and under them a quarter round, adorned with eggs and dashes. Pausan., Description of the East, II. 11. 38

Cymatogaster (si-mä-tö-gas'tër), n. [NL., < Gr. κύμα (-), ictus, + γαστήρ, belly.] A genus of surf-fishes, of the family Embiotridæ. C. cuneatus is an abundant fish of the Pacific coast of the United States, known as the skinner, menhaden, and sparada.

cymatolite (si-mat'ö-lit), n. [Gr. κύμα (-), wave, + λίθος, stone.] A mineral substance produced by the alteration of spodumene, appearing in white masses with a delicate wavy, fibrous structure. It is an intimate mixture of muscovite and albite.

cymba (sim'ba), n. [NL., < L. cymba, < Gr. κύμβα, a boat: see cymbal, cymbalum.] 1. Pl. cymba (-bë). In the nomenclature of sponge-spicules, a boat-shaped microsclero or flesh-spicule. The cymba resembles in profile the letter C. The back or curve is called the keel or trough, the points are the prongs or spines. The prong when lobed or alate are termed plata. Two varieties of the cymba are known as the pleurocymba and oocymba. See these words.

2. [cap.] In conch., same as cymbium, 1.

cymbasform (sim'bë-för-m), a. Same as cymbiform.

cymbal (sim'bal), n. [ME. cimbale, cymbale, < OF. cimbale, F. cymbale = Sp. cimbato = Pg. cymbalo = It. cimbalo, cembalo = D. cymbaal = G. Dan. cymbel = Sw. cymbal, < L. cymbalum, < Gr. κύμβαλον, a cymbal, < κύμβος, κύμβα, the hollow of a vessel, bowl, basin, cup, boat, knapsack, etc., = Skt. kumbhî, kumbhî, a pot, jar: see cumb.] 1. One of a pair of concave plates of brass or bronze which, when struck together, produce a sharp, ringing sound: usually in the plural. Their use varies from little metallic antanets on finger-cymbals to large orchestral cymbals made to be used with the large or long drum. Instruments of the cymbal family are known from the earliest historic times. They are especially useful for rhythmic effect, though some experiments have been made with plates so shaped and used as to give tones of definite pitch.

I am become an sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal 1 Cor. xiii. 1

In vain with cymbals' ring They call the grisly king, In diurnal dance about the furnace blue. Milton, Nativity, l. 208

2. In organ-building, a mixture-stop of very high pitch.—3. A musical instrument made of a piece of steel wire, in a triangular form, on which are passed several rings, which are touched and shifted along the triangle with an iron rod held in the right hand, while the cymbal is supported in the left by a cord. Also spelled symbal. Imp. Diet.

cymbal-doctor (sim'bal-dok'tör), n. A teacher whose instruction is like the tinkling of a cymbal. Compare 1 Cor. xiii. 1. [Rare.]

These petty glosses, no like the quibbles of a court sermon that we may safely reckon . . . that the hand of some household priest foliated them in, lest the world should forget how much he was a disciple of those cymbal-doctors. Milton, Elkonoikastes, vii

cymbaled, cymballed (sim'bald), a. [cymbal + -ed.] Furnished with cymbals. [Rare.]

And highest among the statues, statue-like, Between a cymbal d Miriam and a Jael, With Psyche's babe, was Ida watching us. Tennyson, Princess, v.

cymbaler, cymballer (sim'bal-ër), n. [cymbal + -er.] One who performs on a cymbal; a cymbalist. Fallows.

cymbalist (sim'bal-ist), n. [cymbal + -ist.] One who plays the cymbals.

cymballed, cymballer. See cymbaled, cymbaler.

cymbate (sim'bät), a. [L. cymba, a boat (see cymba), + -ate.] Boat-shaped, as that form of sponge-spicule called a cymba. Sollas.

cymbecephalic (sim'bë-se-fal'ik or sim'bë-sef'-i-lik), a. [Gr. κύμβη, a hollow, + κεφαλή, head, + -ic.] Same as cymbecephalic. Dunghison.

Oymbidium (sim-bid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. κύμβα, κύμβη, a hollow, a cup, boat (see cymbal), + ιδιον.] A genus of tropical terrestrial orchids, often having spikes of beautiful flowers, on which account several of them are favorites in the greenhouse. There are about 30 species, natives of eastern Asia, Australia, and Africa.

cymbiform (sim'bi-för-m), a. [L. cymba, a boat, + forma, shape.] Boat-shaped; longer than broad, convex, and keeled like the bottom of a boat: applied to the elytra and other parts of insects, to seeds and leaves of plants, diatoms, and spores of fungi, and also to a bone of the foot usually called the scaphoid bone. See scaphoid. Also cymbasform.

Cymbirhynchus (sim-bi-ring'kus), n. [NL. (N. A. Vigors, 1831), also written cymbirhynchus, and more correctly cymborhynchus; < Gr. κύμβα, κύμβος, a cup, + ῥις, snout, beak.] A notable genus of coccymorph birds, of the family Luridae, so called from the size and shape of the bill. The type is C. macrorhynchus, the blue-billed gaper, of Borneo, Sumatra, Java, etc.

Cymbium (sim'bi-um), n. [NL., < L. cymba, also cymba, a boat or skiff, < Gr. κύμβα, the hollow of a vessel, a boat, a knapsack: see cymbal and cumb.] 1. A genus of gastropods, of the family Volutidae.

The shell is ob-ovate, tumid, ventral side covered with a strong, cypidina, and the pillar four plaited. They are found on the At in an coast, and known as boat-shells. C. atropica and C. trochodonta are examples. Also Cymba.

2. In entom., a genus of beetles, of the family Tropetidae. Schultz, 1873.—3. [l. c.] In Gr. antiqu., a form of vase of deep and upright shape, without foot or handles; a bowl.

cymblin, cymbiling (sim'blin, -bling), n. Same as cymbin.

cymbocephalic (sim'bë-se-fal'ik or sim'bë-sef'-i-lik), a. [As cymbocephaly + -ic.] Shaped like a bowl or cup; round; specifically, pertaining to or exhibiting cymbocephaly.

cymboccephalic (sim-bü-sef'-e-lik), n. [Gr. κύμβα, bowl, + κεφαλή, head.] In cranol., a bilobed form of the skull.

Cymbula (sim-bü'h-ä), n. [NL., < L. cymbula, a small boat, dim. of cymba, boat: see cymbal, and cf. cymba.] The typical genus of the family Cymbulidae, having a slipper-shaped shell pointed in front and square behind. C. proboscidea is an example.

Boat-shell (Cymbula proboscidea, etc.)

Cymbulidae (sim-bū-lī'dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cymbula + -idae.] A family of thecosomatous pteropods. The animal is oval and has very large rounded fins, and there are three radular teeth in each transverse row, the median very wide and the lateral moderately wide and unicuspid; the shell has the form of a sandal, and is cartilaginous and mostly internal. Genera of this family are Cymbulia, Tiedemannia, and Halopachis.

The Cymbulidae are noticeable for their comparatively large size and the very peculiar shell which they secrete. In early life . . . they have a small, spiral, horny shell, but this becomes lost, and in its place the animal secretes a cartilaginous slipper-shaped shell, apparently possessing no more consistency than ordinary gelatine jelly. In this thick, transparent, flexible shell sits the mollusk, like the old woman in her shoe, paddling about by the large oval wings.

Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 3:8.

cyme (sim), n. [Also, as NL., cyma, < Gr. κύμα (> L. cyma), a young sprout, etc., same as cyma a wave, swell, etc.; see cyma.] 1. In bot.: (a)

a. Cyme of house leek. A of forget-me-not. b. Cyme of forget-me-not. A of forget-me-not. A of forget-me-not. A of forget-me-not.

An inflorescence of the definite or determinate class; any form of inflorescence in which the primary axis bears a single terminal flower which develops first, the inflorescence being continued by secondary, tertiary, and other axes. The secondary and other axes may be given off on both sides of the primary axis (a dichotomous or bipartite cyme or dichotomous) or in such a way as to cause the inflorescence to assume a helical or acropetal form (as in the forget-me-not). The term is applied especially to a broad and flattened compound form. (b) A panicle, the elongation of all the ramifications of which is arrested so that it has the appearance of an umbel.—2. In arch., same as cyma.

Also cima.
cymelet (sim'let), n. [ < cyme + -let.] Same as cymule.

cymene (sī'mēn), n. [ < cym(inum) + -ene.] A hydrocarbon ( $C_{10}H_{14}$ ) occurring in the volatile oil of Roman cumin, in camphor, in the oil of thyme, etc., and prepared by treating oil of turpentine with oil of vitriol. It is a colorless, strongly refracting liquid, and has a pleasant odor of lemon. Also cymol and camphogen.

cymic (sī'mik), a. [ < cym(inum) + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from cymium or cumin.—Cymic acid,  $C_{10}H_{12}O_2$ , a monocyclic acid forming prismatic crystals insoluble in water.

cymiferous (sī-mīf'ē-rus), a. [ < NL. cyma, a cyme, + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., producing cymes.

Cymindis (sī-min'dis), n. [NL., < Gr. κίμινδης, an unidentified bird, described by Aristotle as haunting the mountains, black, of the size of a small hawk, long and slender in form.] 1. In entom., a genus of adelphagous beetles, of the family Carabidae. Latreille, 1806.—2. In ornith., a genus of American hawks of small size, related to the kites. The tarsus is bare below, the nostrils are linear and oblique; the tarsi are bare, the bill is slender and much hooked at the end, the tail is rounded; and the wings are short. The genus was named by Vieillot, 1817, on the Cayenne hawk, C. cymensis.

Cayenne Hawk 'Cymindis cymensis'

cymium (sī-mī'num), n. [L., also cuminum, > cumin, q. v.] Same as cumin.

cymula, n. See cymula.

cymobotryose (sī-mō-bot'ri-ōs), a. [As cymobotrya + -ose.] In bot., same as thyroid.

cymobotrya (sī-mō-bot'ri-a), n. [NL., < Gr. κύμα, a young sprout (see cyma), + βότρυς, a cluster of grapes.] In bot., same as thyra.

cymogene (sī-mō-jēn), n. [ < Gr. κύμα (nov), cumin, + -γενε, producing; see cumin and -gen.] A mixture of very volatile hydrocarbons found in crude petroleum. When the crude petroleum is distilled, cymogene passes off as a gas at the usual temperature of the condenser, but by low temperature and compression it is reduced to a very volatile liquid having a specific gravity of .603–.578. It is used as a freeing mixture.

cymoid (sī'moid), a. [ < cyme + -oid.] Having the form of a cyme.

cymol (sī'mol), n. [ < L. cym(inum) + -ol.] Same as cymene.

cymophane (sī-mō-fān), n. [ < F. cymophane, < Gr. κύμα, a wave, + φανής, < φαίνω, show.] Chrysoberyll.

Hot white arm, that wore a twisted chain (inspired with an opal sheen cymophane).
O. W. Holmes, The Mysterious Illness.

cymophaneus (sī-mōf'ā-nus), a. [As cymophane + -ous.] Having a wavy floating light; opalescent; chatoyant.

cymose, cymous (sī'mōs, sī'mus), a. [ < L. cymosus, full of shoots. < cyma, a shoot, sprout; see cyma.] Bearing a cyme; composed of cymes; pertaining to or resembling a cyme.

cymosely (sī'mō-sē-lē), adv. In a cymose manner: as, "branching cymosely," Farlow, Marine Alga, p. 103.

Cymothoa (sī-mōth'ō-ā), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1794), < Gr. κύμα, anything swollen, a wave, etc.,

Cymothoa a. a. d. x. upper and under view. 1 in. shows natural size.

+ θούα, quick, also pointed.] The typical genus of the family Cymothoidae. C. castrum is a common kind of fish-louse, parasitic upon many fishes, to which it clings tightly by means of its hooked legs.

Cymothoidae (sī-mō-thō'idē), n. pl. [NL., < Cymothoa + -idae.] A family of isopod crustaceans, of the group Eusopoda, typified by the genus Cymothoa, mostly parasitic on fish. The technical characters are a broad abdomen, with short segments and a scutate caudal plate, the posterior maxillipeds operulate, and the mouth-parts formed for biting or sucking. There are several genera besides Cymothoa as Serolis, Ron Leriche, Cerolana, and Ceranthothoa. Also written Cymothoda.

cymous, a. See cymose.

Cymry, n. pl. See Cymry.

Cymric, Kymric (kim'rik), a. and n. [With accom. term. -ic, < W. Cymraeg, Welsh, Cymry, the Welsh language; < Cymro, pl. Cymry, a Welshman, (Cymru, Wales; see Cymry.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Cymry and their kindred, the Cornishmen and Bretons.

He (Monsieur Edwards) . . . finds abundant traces of the physical type which he has established as the Cymric still subsisting in our population, and having descended from the old British possessors of our soil before the Saxon conquest. M. Arnold, Study of Celtic Literature, III.

II. n. The language of the Cymry, or of the Cymric division of the Celtic race of Britain.

Cymry, Kymry (kim'ri), n. pl. [W. Cymry, pl. of Cymro, a Welshman; cf. Cymru, ML. Cambria, Wales. The origin of the name is unknown; some connect it with W. Cymmer, a confluence of waters; cf. aber, river.] The name given to themselves by the Welsh. In its wider application the term is often applied to that division of the Celtic race which is more nearly akin with the Welsh, including also the Cornishmen and the Bretons or Armorians, as distinguished from the Gaelic division. Also written Cymry, Cymry.

Physical marks, such as the square head of the Gorman, the round head of the Gael, the oval head of the Cymry, which determine the type of a people.

M. Arnold, Study of Celtic Literature, III.

cymule (sī'mūl), n. [ < NL. cymula (cf. L. cymula, a tender sprout), dim. of cyma; see cyma, cyme.] In bot., a simple or diminutive cyme, by itself or forming part of a compound cyme. Also cymelot.

cymulose (sī'mū-lōs), a. [ < cymule + -ose.] Bearing or composed of cymules; pertaining to or resembling a cymule.

Cynalutrus (sī-nā-lū'trus), n. pl. [NL., < Cynalutrus + -ina.] A subfamily of Felidae, represented by the genus Cynalutrus: a synonym of Guopardina (which see). Also written Cynailutrus.

Cynalutrus (sī-nā-lū'trus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύων (kun), a dog, + αλώπου, a cat.] A genus of dog-like cats, containing the cheetah or hunting leopard of India, C. jubata: a synonym of Guoparda (which see). Also written Cynailutrus. Wagler, 1830.

cynanche (sī-nang'hē), n. [LL. (> ult. E. equus, nancy, quincy, q. v.), < Gr. κυνάγχη, dog-quincy, a kind of sore throat, also a dog-collar, < κύων (kun), a dog (= E. hound = L. canis, a dog), + ἀγχή, choke, suffocate.] A name of various diseases of the throat or windpipe, attended with inflammation, swelling, and difficulty of breathing and swallowing, as cynanche parotidæ, tonsillar, trachealis, etc.—Cynanche maligna. Same as angina maligna (which see, under angina).

Cynanchum (sī-nang'kum), n. [NL., < LL. cynanche, in reference to its poisonous qualities; see cynanche.] An asclepiadaceous genus of climbing plants, of the Mediterranean region and Australia, of about 20 species. The root of the European C. Vincetoxicum is emetic and purgative, and C. acutum is said to afford French or Montpellier scammony. See swallowwort, I. and scammony.

cynanthropy (sī-nan'thrō-pi), n. [= F. cynanthropie, < Gr. κυνάνθρωπος, < κύων (kun), a dog-man, < άνθρωπος (anthropos), man. Cf. lycanthropy.] A kind of madness in which the afflicted person imagines himself to be a dog, and imitates its voice and actions.

Cynara (sī-nā-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύναρα, a plant not determined, supposed to be either the dog-thorn (< κύων (kun), a dog) or κύναρα, the artichoke.] A small genus of composites, of the Mediterranean region, in many respects like the thistle, but having an involucre composed of thick, fleshy, spiny scales, and a remarkably thick, fleshy receptacle covered with numerous bristles. The two best-known species are the artichoke (C. scolymus) and the cardoon (C. cardunculus), cultivated as vegetables. The other species are troublesome weeds now widely naturalized upon the plains of extratropical South America. See cut under artichoke.

Cynaraceæ (sī-nā-rā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < (Cynara + -aceæ).] Same as Cynaroidæ.

cynaraceous (sī-nā-rā'shē-us), a. [ < Cynara + -aceous.] Belonging to or resembling the Cynaraceæ or Cynaroidæ.

cynarctomachy (sī-nārk-tom'a-ki), n. [ < Gr. κύων (kun), a dog, < άρκτος, a bear, + μαχη, a fight.] Bear-baiting with a dog: a humorous word invented by Butler.

Some occult design doth lie
In bloody cynarctomachy
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. i. 752

cynareous (sī-nā-rē-us), a. [ < (Cynara + -eous).] Same as cynaraceous.

cynaroid (sī-nā-rōid), a. [ < (Cynara + -oid).] Same as cynaraceous.

Cynaroides (sī-nā-rōi'dē-s), n. pl. [NL., < (Cynara + -oides).] A tribe of the natural order Compositæ, of which the genus Cynara is the type, distinguished by having the anthers conspicuously caudate, the flowers all hermaphrodite with tubular corollas and setose pappus, and the leaves usually prickly. The largest genera are Cynara and Centaurea. Also Cynaraceæ. See Cynara.

cynobot (A.-S. pron. kū'ne-bōt), n. [AS., < cyn (in comp.), king, + bōt, fine, boot; see king and boot.] In Anglo-Saxon law, that part of the fine imposed on the murderer of a king which was paid to the community, as distinguished from the wergild paid to the king's kin.

By the Mercian law it (wergild payable to the king's kin on his violent death) was 7200 shillings. . . . A fine of equal amount, the cynobot, was at the same time due to his people.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 50.

cynogetic (sī-nō-jet'ik), a. [= F. cynogétique = Sp. cinegético, < Gr. κυνήτιος, pertaining to hunting, < κύνητις, a hunter, < κύων (kun), a dog, + γενήτις, lead.] Concerning or having to do with hunting or cynogetics. [Rare.]

Jacques du Fouilloux, the celebrated veneer and cynogetic writer of the sixteenth century.
N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 66.

cynogetics (sī-nō-jet'iks), n. [ < L. cynogeticus, < Gr. κυνήτιος, neut. pl. of κυνήτιος, pertaining to hunting; see cynogetic and -ics.] The art of hunting with dogs. [Rare.]

There are extant . . . in Greek four books on cynogetics, or venation.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., I. 2.

responding divisions being Aluroidea and Arotoidea. The Cynoides agree most nearly with the Aluroidea, but have a well-developed carpal canal opening into the foramen lacrum posterius, a distinct condyloid foramen, an open glenoid foramen, undeveloped Cowper's glands, and a large os penis. There is but one family the Canidae, including the dogs, wolves, foxes, etc. See Canidae.

The Dogs (including the Wolves, Jackals, and Foxes under this head) form the most central group of the Caninivora, which may be termed the Cynoides.

Huxley, Anat. Vert. p. 348

cynolysa (si-nō-lis'g), n. [NL., < Gr. κύνω, κύνω, canine madness (cf. Gr. κύνω, mad, from the bite of a dog), < Gr. λύω (λύω), a dog, +
λύω, madness.] Canine madness. See rabies.

Cynomorium (si-nō-mō'r-i-um), n. [NL. (L. cynomorium, Pliny), < Gr. κύνω, a name of the opopanax (prob. broom-rape, orobanche), < κύνω (κύνω), a dog, + μορφή, a part, prop. dim. of μορφή (a part), lot, destiny; cf. μορφή, a part.] A genus of plants belonging to the natural order Balanophoraceae.

Cynomorium coccineum
a, cluster of male and female flowers, b section of fruit

The only species C. coccineum, is a red, fleshy, herbaceous plant, covered with leaves, and is a native of northern Africa, Malta, and the Levant. It was known to the old herbalists as fungus
Melitenae, and was valued as an astring-ent and styptic in cases of dysentery and hemorrhage. It was held in such esteem by the Knights of Malta that it was carefully deposited in stores, from which the grand master sent it in presents to sovereigns, hospitals, etc.

Cynomorpha, Cynomorpha (si-nō-mō'r-fā, -fē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύνω (κύνω), a dog, + μορφή, form.] A division of catarrhine monkeys, including the baboons and other lower monkeys, as distinguished from the anthropoid apes, or Anthropomorpha.

cynomorphic (si-nō-mō'r-fik), a. [Cynomorpha
+ -ic.] Pertaining to the Cynomorpha; cynopithecoid.

Cynomyonax (si-nō-mī'ō-naks), n. [NL.
(Coen, 1877), < Cynomys + Gr. ἀναξ, king.]
A genus of ferrets, of the family Mustelidae and subfamily Mustelinae, related to Putorius. The Black footed Ferret (Cynomyonax nigripes) type is the black footed ferret of North America C. nigripes, found in the towns of the prairie dog (Cynomys), whence the name.

Cynomys (si-nō-mis), n. [NL. (Rafinesque, 1817), < Gr. κύνω (κύνω), a dog, + μῦς, mouse.]
A genus of rodent quadrupeds, of the spermo-phil division of the family Sciuridae, approaching the marmots proper (Arctomys) in the stout, thick-set body and short, bushy tail. The pelage is close and harsh, the nail of the thumb is well marked, the outer ears are rudimentary, the cheek pouches are small, the skull is massive, short, and broad, with zygomatic arches and large postorbital processes, and the dentition is very strong and heavy. The genus contains the well known prairie dogs or barking squirrels of western North America, which live in extensive underground burrows, in colonies, often of immense extent, in the sterile regions of the West. There are two species, C. ludovici the common prairie dog, whose range in general is from the plains to the Rocky Mountains, and C. columbianus, extending thence westward. See cut under prairie- dog.

Cynonycteris (si-nō-nik'te-ris), n. [NL., < Gr.
κύνω (κύνω), a dog, + νύκτερις, a bat; see Nycteris.]
A genus of fruit-bats, of the family Pteropodidae, differing from Pteropus in having a tail, though a short one, and the fur of the neck not woolly. There are about 8 species, extending from the Malay peninsula into Africa. C. cynoptera haunts the chamirs of the peninsula, and is probably the species often represented in Egyptian paintings and sculptures.
C. collaris is the collared fruit bat of Africa.

cynophrenology (si-nō-frē-nōl'ō-jī), n. [Cyn- phrenology, a dog, + phrenology.] The phrenology of the dog's brain. Hilder.

Cynopithecidae (si-nō-pi-thē-si-dō), n. pl.
[NL., < Cynopithecus + -idae.] The lower one of the two great families into which the catar-rhine quadrumanous quadrupeds are divided, containing all excepting the anthropoid apes of the family Simiidae. It is divided into two sub-families: (1) Semnopitheciinae, with complex stomach and no cheek-pouches, containing the genera Nasalis, Semnopithecus, Colobus, etc.; and (2) Cynopitheciinae, with simple stomach and cheek-pouches. The characters of the family are chiefly comparative or negative, being those in which the general structure resembles from the man-like type presented by the higher simians. The gradation from the highest semnopithecoïd to the lowest cynopithecoïd is a gentle one, though the difference between these extremes is great.

Cynopithecinae (si-nō-pi-thē-si-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cynopithecus + -inae.] The lower one of the two subfamilies into which the Cynopitheciidae are divisible, including all kinds of cynopithecoïd apes, monkeys, and baboons which have a simple stomach and cheek-pouches. The leading forms are Cercopithecus, or ordinary long-tailed monkeys; Macacus, the macaques, and some short-tailed forms closely related to the latter, as Tricus and Cynopo-ithecus, commonly called apes, with Papio or Cynocephalus and Mandrillus or Morinus, the dog-faced and pig-faced baboons. See Cynopithecus.

cynopithecoïd (si-nō-pi-thē-kō'id), a. and n. [Cynopithecus + -oid.] I. a. Pertaining to the lower series of catarrhine monkeys; not simian or anthropoid; cynomorphic: specifically applied to the Cynopitheciidae.

II. n. One of the Cynopitheciidae; a cynopithecoïd ape, monkey, or baboon.

Cynopithecus (si-nō-pi-thē-sus), n. [NL., <
Gr. κύνω (κύνω), a dog, + πίθηκος, an ape.] A genus of catarrhine monkeys, of the family (Cy-

Black Ape of Celebes (Cynopithecus niger)

nopitheciidae, and giving name to the subfamily Cynopitheciinae. The type and only species is C. niger, of Borneo. It is a large, black, tailless monkey commonly called an apu as a count of its general aspect. It is an isolated and peculiar form, not well representing the subfamily to which it gives name except in standing midway in the general series and connecting the cercopithecoïds and macaques with the baboons.

Cynopoda (si-nō-pō-dā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl.
of cynopodus; see cynopodus.] In zool., a name given by J. E. Gray to the herpetine or ich-neumon division of the family Pyrrhidae, the species of this division being cynopodous. The term is contrasted with Aluropoda.

cynopodous (si-nō-pō-dus), a. [Cynopoda, < Gr. κύνω (κύνω), a dog, + πῶς (πῶς) = E.
foot.] Dog-footed; having feet like a dog's, or with blunt, non-retractile claws: opposed to Aluropodous, or ent-footed: specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Cynopoda.

Cynopterus (si-nō-p'te-rus), n. [NL. (Cuvier), < Gr. κύνω (κύνω), a dog, + πτερόν = E. wing.]
A genus of oriental fruit-bats, of the family
Pteropodidae, externally resembling Cynomyceteris. C. marginatus, a common Indian species, is very destructive to fruit; an individual of the species has been known to devour two ounces of bananas in three hours, yet to weigh but one ounce when killed next morning. Its dental formula is 1, 1 or 2, 1, 1, pm., 3, m., 3.

cynorexia (si-nō-rek'si-gē), n. [NL., < Gr. κύνω (κύνω), a dog, + ὄρεξις, appetite, desire, < ὄρεξις, reach after, grasp at, desire.] In pathol., an insatiable, voracious appetite, like that of a dog; bulimia.

cynorrhodon, cynorrhodium (si-nō-rō-don, sinō-rō'di-um), n. [NL., < L. cynorrhodon, the dogrose, < Gr. κύνω (κύνω), a dog, + ῥόδον, a rose.] In bot., a fruit like that of the rose, fleshy and hollow, inclosing the achenes.

Common Weakfish or Squeteague (Cynoscion regalis)

Cynoscion (si-nō-si'on), n. [NL. (Gill, 1861), <
Gr. κύνω (κύνω), a dog, + (?) σκία, a sea-fish; see Soiana.] A genus of selenoid fishes, of which there are several well-known and important species. C. regalis is the common weakfish or squeteague;
C. maculatus is the spotted weakfish; two Californian species are C. pinnatifidus and C. nobilis. See weakfish.

cynosural, n. See cynosure.

cynosural (si-nō or si-nō-sū-rāl), a. [Cynosure + -al.] Relating to or of the nature of a cynosure; attracting attention, as a cynosure.

Had either, Madam, of that cynosural triad (Raleigh, Sidney, and Spenser) been within call of my most humble importunities, your ears had been delectate with far nobler melody. Kingsley, Westward Ho, p. 38.

cynosure (si-nō or si-nō-sū-r), n. [At first in L. form cynosura; = F. cynosure = Pg. cyno-sura = Sp. It. cinosura, < L. Cynosura, < Gr.
Κύνωσσυρα, the constellation of the Little Bear, containing the star which is now but was not then the pole-star (which forms the tip of the tail), and thus often the object to which the eyes of mariners were directed, lit. the dog's tail, < κύνω, dog's (gen. of κύνω, dog), + οὐρά, tail.] Something that strongly attracts attention; a center of attraction.

Where perhaps some beauty lies,

The Cynosure of neighbouring eyes.

Milton, L'Allegro, l. 80.

Let the fundamentals of faith be your cynosure, your great light to walk by. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1855), II, 124.

The Chevalier Bayard, the cynosure of Chivalry.
Sumner, True Grandeur of Nations

Cynosurus (si-nō-sū-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύνω, κύνω, dog's tail; see cynosure.] A genus of grasses with the flower-spikelets forming a unilateral spike. There are but three or four species, of the Mediterranean region, of which C. cristatus is considered a good pasture-grass.

Cynthia (sin'thi-g), n. [L. (sc. dea), Diana (Artemis), the Cynthia (goddess), fem. of Cyn-thus, adj. of Cynthus, < Gr. Κύνθος, a mountain in Delos, birthplace of Apollo and Artemis (Diana).] 1. In myth., one of the names given to Artemis (Diana), from her reputed birthplace, Mount Cynthus in the island of Delos. Hence
— 2. In poetry, a name of the moon, the emblem of Diana.

You gray is not the morning's eye,

Tis but the pale reflex of Cynthia's brow.

Shak., R. and J., III, 5

3. In zool.: (a) A genus of nymphalid butterflies, containing such as the painted-lady, C. cardui. Fabricius, 1808. (b) A genus of simple sessile tunicaries, of the family Ancudidae, with coriaceous body-wall and four-lobed oral and atrial orifices. Sars, 1827. (c) A genus of crustaceans. Thompson, 1829. (d) A genus of Coleoptera. Latreille, 1829. (e) A genus of Diptera. DeMeijere, 1863.

cyon, n. An obsolete form of cyon.

Cyon (si'on), n. [NL., < Gr. κύνω (κύνω) = L.
canis = E. hound, a dog; see Cynus and hound.]
A genus of wild dogs of southeastern Asia, differing from Canis in lacking the small last lower molar. It contains such forms as C. primivus, the Indian sauh, regarded by some as a primitive type of the domestic dog C. domestica, the Indian, the Chinese, or wild dog of the Indian, India, & C. sinensis, of Sumatra. The genus was established by Hodgkin. Also written Cyon and Kyon. See cut under hound.

cyphoria (si-ō-rī-gē), n. [NL., < Gr. κυφός, pregnancy, < κυφός, pregnant, < κύος, fetus, +
φορέω, bearing, < φορέω = E. bear.] In med., the time of gestation, or of carrying the fetus;
the period of pregnancy.

Cyperaceae (si-pē-rā-sē-sē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyperus + -aceae.] The sedge family, a natural order of monocotyledonous plants nearly allied to the grasses, including 60 genera and between 2,000 and 3,000 species. The plants of this order are grassy or rush like and generally perennial herbs with solid and often triangular stems, and leaves with closed sheaths. The small flowers are borne in spikelets and are solitary in the axils of the glumaceous bracts. The fruit is a small coriaceous achene. The plants are found in all climates, and are often abundant, but are little eaten by cattle. Some club-rushes are used for making mats, chair-bottoms, etc. The papyrus of Egypt was made from the stems of Cyperus Papyrus.
The principal genera are Cyperus, Cyperus, Panicum, Scirpus, Rhynchospora, and Scleria.

cyperaceous (si-pē-rā-sē-sē), a. Belonging to or resembling plants of the family Cyperaceae— that is, sedges and their congeners.

cyperographer (si-pē-rō-g'ra-fēr), n. [Cyperus, q. v., + Gr. γράφω, write, + -er.]
A writer on the Cyperaceae. Bentham, Notes on Cyperaceae, p. 361.

cyperologist (si-pē-rōl'ō-jist), n. [Cyperus, q. v., + Gr. λογία (see -ology) + -ist.]

In bot., a writer or an authority upon the genus Cyperus.

Cyperus (si-pr'us), n. [NL. (L. cyperus, cyperus), < Gr. κύπερος (Herodotus), an aromatic plant used in embalming, prob. same word as κύπερος, name of a sweet-smelling marsh-plant, also sedge, gladiolus. The L. name appears in F. as cyperus, and in E. as cyperus (Gerard), cyperus (Cotgrave): see cyperus.] A genus of plants, natural order Cyperaceae, of about 700 species, very widely distributed, but especially abundant in tropical and subtropical regions. There are about 50 species in the United States. They are annuals or perennials, with triangular naked culms usually bearing an irregular umbel of flattened spikelets. A few of the species, as C. aculeatus and C. bulbosus, have tuberous roots which are used for food. C. rotundus, known as nutgrass, and C. phymatodes multiply rapidly by slender tuberiferous rootstocks, and become pests in cultivated fields. The tubers of the former yield an oil, which is much used in upper India as a perfume.

cyphel (si-fel'), n. Same as cyphella.

cyphella (si-fel'-g), n. [NL., < Gr. κύπελλα, the hollow of the ear, akin to κύπελλον, a drinking-vessel, < κύπτω, the hollow of a vessel: see cyphal.] 1. Pl. cyphella (-s). A cup-like pit or depression on the under surface of the thallus in certain lichens. The color is usually white or yellow. Also cyphel.—2. [cap.] A genus of hymenomycetous fungi, belonging to the family Auriculariinae. The hymenium is inferior and confluent with the pileus, and the latter is somewhat cup shaped and frequently pendulous.

cyphellaform (si-fel'-fōrm), a. [Cyphella, q. v., + L. forma, shape.] Cup-shaped.

cyphellate (si-fel'-at), a. [Cyphella + -ate.] In bot., provided with cyphellae.

cypher, n. and v. See cypher.

cyphi, n. Plural of cyphus.

Cyphomandra (si-fō-man'drā), n. [NL. (so called from the thickened and curved connective), < Gr. κύψω, hump, + ανδρα, man (mod. bot. stamen).] A solanaceous genus, of South America, closely allied to Nitellum, comprising about 20 species of small trees or shrubs.

(C. betacea, the tree tomato of Peru, is cultivated in subtropical countries for its large pear-shaped, orange-colored fruit, which is used in the same way as the tomato.)

Cyphon (si-fōn), n. [NL., < Gr. κύψω, a crooked piece of wood, < κύφω, bent, stooping: see cyphus.] A genus of beetles, of the family Dacnidae, or giving name to a family Cyphonidae. Paykull, 1798.

cyphonantes (si-fō-nā'tēs), n.; pl. cyphonantes. [NL., < Gr. κύφω, bent, stooping, + ναυτης, sailor.] The larva of a gymnomelous polyzoan of the genus Membranipora: formerly mistaken for a distinct organism, and referred to a special genus of rotifers by Ehrenberg.

Other larval forms [of Polyzoa], which are apparently of a very different structure, . . . e. g. Cyphonantes, a larva which is found in all seas, and is, according to Schneider, the larva of Membranipora pilosa.

(Cyphus, Zoology (trans), II 76)

Cyphonidae (si-fōn'-idē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyphon + -idae.] A family of serricorn malsacodermatous Coleoptera or beetles, related to the Cedriidae. They are of small size, with rather soft, depressed, hemispherical or ovate bodies, and furcate labial palps. They are beetles of dull colors, found on plants in damp situations, flying and running with agility. The family is also called Basidiidae.

cyphonism (si-fō-nizm), n. [Cyphus, q. v., + ισμ, a pillory in which slaves and criminals were fastened by the neck.] A form of punishment practised in antiquity, supposed by some to have consisted in besmearing the criminal with honey, and then exposing him to insects, and by others to have been identical with the Chinese castrus. See castrus.

Cyphophthalmidae (si-fōf-thal'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyphophthalmus + -idae.] A family of tracheate arachnidans, named from the genus Cyphophthalmus, having stalked eyes: synonymous with Sironidae (which see).

Cyphophthalmus (si-fōf-thal'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύφω, bent, + ὄφθαλμος, eye.] A genus of harvest-spiders? a synonym of Siro.

cyphosis (si-fō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύφω, a being humpbacked, < κύφωσις, be humpbacked, < κύφω, humpbacked, bent forward, < κύρνω, bend.] In pathol., a curvature of the spine, convex backward. Usually written kyphosis. Cyphus (si-pr'us), n. [NL., appar. < Gr. κύφω, bent, curved, < κύρνω, bend.] 1. A genus of weevils, of the family Cyrtolichidae. Schönherr, 1838.—2. A genus of South American barbets. The type is C. macrodactylus. Also Cyphus. Spix, 1824.

cyphus, n. See cyphus.

Cypraea (si-pr'ē-g), n. [NL., with allusion to Cypris, Venus: see Cyprina.] A genus of gas-tropoda, type of the family Cypridae; the cowries. Cypraea moneta is the money-cowry, used in many parts of the world as a circulating medium. C.

annulus is used by the Pacific islanders for barter, ornament, and other purposes. C. tigris is a handsome species, a frequent mantel-ornament. See cow-

ry. Also Cypra.

cypræid (si-pr'ē-id), n.

A gastropod of the family Cypridae.

Cypræidae (si-pr'ē-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., <

Cypræa + -idae.] A family of gastropo-

dous mollusks, the cowries.

They have a scutellum, convoluted, enameled shell, with concealed suture and a long and narrow aperture with crenulated lips, an sili-late at each end, no operculum;

a broad foot, and a lob-ate mantle. The leading genus is Cypræa (to which the family is now often restricted),

Oculina (or Oculina), and Pedicularia. Also Cypræidae, Cypræa, Cypræid.

cypræiform (si-pr'ē-i-fōrm), a.

[< NL. Cypræa,

q. v., + L. forma, form.]

Having the form or characters of Cypræa.

cypræoid (si-pr'ē-oid), a. and n.

[< Cypræa +

-oid.] 1. a. Of or relating to the Cypræidae.

II. n. A cypræid.

cy-præ (si-pr'ē). [OF., so near,

as near: cy, ci (see ci-derivat);

præ, mod. F. præ = it.

pressus, near, < L. pressus, pressed (close): see press.]

In law, as near as practicable.

Doctrine of cy-præ, an equitable doctrine (applicable only to cases of trusts or charities) which, in place of an illegal or impossible condition, limitation, or object, allows the nearest practicable one to be substituted. Thus, in some of the United States when a charity necessarily ceases through the lapse of its object—as, for instance, one for the emancipation of slaves—the courts turn the property over to a similar charity rather than that it should revert to the heirs.

cypræus (si-pr'ē-us), n. and a.

[Early mod. E. also cypræus, cypræus; < ME. cypræus, cypræus, fused with it; ME. cypræus, later cypræus (Cot-grave), cypræus, in form < L. cypræus: see cy- prus.] 1. n. 1. In bot.: (a) The popular name of coniferous trees of the genus Cupressus.

The common cypræus of south ern Europe is C. sempervirens, of which there are two forms, one with upright appressed branches like a Lombardy poplar, the other a flat topped tree with horizontal branches. The wood is much used in carpentry.

C. macrocarpa, the Monterey cypræus of California, is a fine ornamental tree, and is frequent ly cultivated.

He beweth him down cedars, and taketh the cypræus and the oak. Isa. xlv 14

(b) A name given to other coniferous trees nearly allied to the true cypræus.

Such are Lawson's cypræus,

Chamaecyparis Lawsoniana

and the yellow or Atika cypræus

C. Nuttalliana, of the Pacific coast of North America, both valuable timber-trees and large ly cultivated for ornament. The bold, deciduous, black swamp red, or white cypræus of the Atlantic States, Taxodium distich- um, a large timber tree of which the wood varies much in color; the desert-cypræus of Arizona, Pinus rigida, and the golden cypræus, Pinus ponderosa, of Japan, with yellow foliage. (c) One of various plants so named from a fancied resemblance to the true cypræus, as the standing cypræus, Gilia coronopifolia, a tall, slender, polemoniaceous herb, with divided leaves and scarlet flowers, and the Belvedere, broom-, or summer cypræus, a tall chenopodaceous plant, Kochia scoparia, sometimes cultivated.—2. An emblem of mourning for the dead, cypræus-branches having been anciently used at funerals.

Bind you my brows with mourning cypræus
By Hall, Elegy on Dr. Whitaker.

Instead of Bays, Crown with sad Cypræus me;
Cypræus which Tombs does Beautifie, Cowley, Death of Mr Wm. Harvey.

Had success attended the American, the death of Warren would have been sufficient to damp the joys of victory, and the cypræus would have been united with the laurel.

Riot's Biography.

II. a. Belonging to or made of cypræus.

In ivory coffers I have stuff'd my crowns
In cypræus chests my arias Shak. T. of the 8, II. 1.

Within the navel of this hideous wood,
Immur'd in cypræus shades, a miser dwells.

Milton, Comus, l. 521.

cypræus (si-pr'ē), n. and a. [First in Shakspere's time, spelled cypræus, cypræus, cypræus, cypræus; origin unknown; possibly (since it is a book-word) from some misreading of
OF. crepe, cypræus, crape: see crape and crape.]
1. a. A thin transparent black or white stuff;
a kind of crape.

Shadow their glory, as a milliner's wife does her wrought stomacher, with a smoky lawn, or a black cypræus!

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, l. 2.

A beauty artificially covered with a thin cloud of Cyprus, transmits its artificiality to the eye, made more greedy and apprehensive by that imperfect and weak restraint.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), l. 21.

II. a. Made of or resembling cypræus.—Cyprus cat, a tabby cat

While discussing the merits of a new kitten recently with a lady from Norwich, she described its colour as Cyprus—dark grey, with black stripes and markings. I took an opportunity of asking a gentleman who had lived in Norfolk as to the colour of the kitten, and his reply was,
"In Norfolk we should call it Cyprus"

N and Q, 7th ser, IV. 220.

Cypræus damask, a rich silk cloth made in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries with cypræus gold.—Cypræus gold, gold thread so made that the surface of the metal is brilliant like metal wire. See cypræus damask, and gold thread, under thread. Rock, Textile Fabrics.—Cypræus lawn. Same as I

Sabbat stole of Cypræus laici
Over thy decent shoulders drawn Milton, II. Pueroco, l. 25.

cypræus (si-pr'ē), n. [Also spelled cypræus, cypræus, altered, by confusion with cypræus, from L. cypræus, galingale: see cypræus.] The English galingale, (Cypræus longus: called succot cyprus from its aromatic roots. Also cypræus-root.

cypræus-knee (si-pr'ē-nē), n. One of the large, hollow, conical excrescences which rise from the roots of the swamp-cypræus, Taxodium distich- um. The cause or reason of their growth is unknown. They are frequently used as beehives by the negroes.

cypræus-moss (si-pr'ē-mōs), n. The club-moss, Lycopodium alpinum.

cypræus-root (si-pr'ē-rōt), n. Same as cypræus.

cypræus-vine (si-pr'ē-vin), n. A Mexican convolvulaceous climber, Ipomoea Quamoclit, with finely parted leaves and bright-scarlet or white flowers. It is frequently cultivated.

Cypræan (si-pr'ē-an), a. and n. [L. Cypræus, < Gr. Κύπριος, pertaining to Κύπρος, L. Cypræus, famous for its worship of Venus (Aphrodite); hence fem., L. Cypræa (also Cypris, < Gr. Κυ- πρις), Venus (Aphrodite): see cypræus.] 1. a.

1. Same as cypræus.—2. Pertaining to Aphrodite or Venus; hence, lewd; wanton.

Is thus that jolly god whose Cypræan bow
Has shot so many flaming darts?

Quarles, Emblem, II. 2.

II. n. 1. Same as Cypræus.—2. A lewd woman; a courtesan; a strumpet.

Cypræicardia (si-pr'ē-kār'di-g), n. [NL., as (Cy- præus, q. v., + Gr. kardia = E. heart.]

A genus of conchiferous or lamellibranch mollusks, of the family Cypræ-

idae, having an oblong shell, with two cardinal teeth and a lateral tooth on each side of the hinge.

Cypridula (si-prid'ul-ā), n. pl. [NL., < ('Cyprid + -ula).] A family of ostracoid entomostracous crustaceans, of the order Ostracoda. The technical characters are: a double median eye, no heart, a pair of light, strong valves or shells, not indented for the passage of the antennae; the anterior antennae usually 7 jointed and beset with long setae, the posterior antennae usually 8 jointed, simple, and pediform; two pairs of legs, and the abdomen furcate, with hooked setae. The second pair of antennae serve as locomotor and prehensile organs. There are several genera, chiefly fresh water forms, as Cypridula, Notodromus, Baridula, etc.

Cypridina (sip-ri-dī'nā), n. [NL., < ('Cyprid + -ina).] The typical genus of ostracoid crustaceans of the family Cypridulidae. C. mediterranea is an example.

Cypridinidae (sip-ri-din'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < ('Cypridina + -idae).] A family of ostracoid entomostracous crustaceans, of the order Ostracoda. The technical characters are: a heart with dorsal aspect; large paired lateral, compound stalked eyes, the shells of valves beaked, and deeply indented for the passage of the antennae; the anterior antennae 7 jointed and setose; the posterior antennae 8 jointed, serving as swimming-organs; the manducatory apparatus abortive, the palp long, pediform, and 5 jointed, and the abdomen ending in a lamella armed with spines and hooks. They are exclusively marine organisms. Cypridina and Antropus are the principal genera.

Cyprina (si-prī'nā), n. [NL. Cf. Cyprinus.] A genus of siphonate bivalve mollusks, of the family Isocardidae, or typical of a family (Cyprina), having two cardinal teeth and a lateral tooth on each valve. C. islandica is a large species of the North Atlantic. Also Cyprine.

Cyprinacea (sip-ri-nā-se-ā), n. pl. [NL., < ('Cyprina + -acea).] A superfamily of mollusks, represented by the Cyprina and related families. See Cyprinidae.

cyprinacean (sip-ri-nā-se-ān), a. and n. [Cf. Cyprinacea + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Cyprinacea.

II. n. One of the Cyprinacea.

cyprine (sip'rin), a. [Cf. Cyprina.] In ichth., cyprinoid; carp-like; pertaining to fishes of the genus Cyprinus or family Cyprinidae.

cyprinus (sip'rin), a. [Short for Cyprinus, < LL. cyprinus, L. cyprinus, < Gr. κυπρινος, of the cypraea, < κυπρια, cypraea; see cypraea.] Of or belonging to the cypraea.

cyprinoid (sip'rin), a. [LL. cyprinus, cyprinus, of copper, < cuprum, copper; see copper.] A variety of vesuvianite or idocrase, of a blue tint, which is supposed to be due to the presence of copper.

Cyprinidae (si-prin'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < ('Cyprina + -idae).] A family of fresh-water fishes, typified by the genus Cyprinus (the carp), of varying limits with different authors. (a) In Cuvier's system, the first family of Melastomatoidei suborder, having a slightly cleft mouth with weak and generally toothless jaws, the border of the mouth being formed by the intermaxillaries and the trifid structure of the jaws consisting of the deeply indented pharyngeals; a small number of branchial rays; the body scaly; and no adipose dorsal fin. (b) In Günther's system, a family of phosatomous fishes, with body generally covered with scales; head naked, margin of upper jaw formed by the intermaxillaries; mouth toothless; lower pharyngeal bones well developed, falciform and parallel with the branchial arches, and provided with teeth in two or three series; air-bladder large, divided into an anterior and a posterior portion by a constriction, or into a right and a left portion inclosed in an osseous capsule (absent in Hemlophidae); and ovarian sacs closed. (c) In Gill's system, a family of eventronathous fishes, with the margin of the upper jaw formed by the intermaxillaries alone, the pharyngeal teeth few, and three basal branchialia. Even with its narrowest limits, it is the largest family of fishes, containing nearly 1,000 species, which by some are referred to more than 300 genera, but by others to much fewer. Very numerous representatives occur in the fresh waters of North America, Europe, and Asia, and fewer in those of Africa, where they have apparently found their way in later Tertiary times. They are absent from the streams of South America, Australia, and all the islands of the Pacific ocean except those of the East Indian archipelago. About 250 species have been found in the United States, most of which are very small. In Europe and Asia species contribute largely to the food-supply of the people, but in America very few are of any economical importance. The most valuable is the true carp, Cyprinus carpio, which has been introduced and is now largely cultivated in the United States. Another species widely dispersed is the ornamental goldfish, Carassius (or Cyprinus) auratus. Dace, roach, chub, shiner, and minnow are names applied to various species. See cuts under carp and goldfish.

Cyprinidae (si-prin'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < ('Cyprina + -idae).] In conch., a family of siphonate bivalve mollusks, taking name from the genus Cyprina. The technical characters are: a regular, equi-valve, oval shell, with thick, strong epidermis; 1-3 principal cardinal teeth; a simple pallial line; and the edges of the mantle fused to form two siphonal openings. Also called Isocardidae. See cut under Cyprina.

cypriniform (si-prin'ī-fōrm), a. [Cf. NL. Cyprinus, q. v., + L. forma, shape.] In form resembling a cyprinoid fish; carp-like.

Cyprinina (sip-ri-nī'nā), n. pl. [NL., < ('Cyprinus + -ina).] In Günther's system, the second group of Cyprinidae. The technical characters are: an air-bladder divided into an anterior and a posterior portion (not inclosed in an osseous capsule); pharyngeal teeth in single, double, or triple series, and few in number, the outer series not containing more than 7; the anal fin very short, with 6 or 8, exceptionally 7, branched rays; a lateral line running along the middle of the tail; and the dorsal fin opposite to the ventrals.

Cyprinodon (si-prin'ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. κυπρινος, a carp, + ὄν, Ionic form of ὄν (ὄν = E. tooth).] The typical genus of the family Cyprinodontidae. La-espède, 1803.

Cyprinodont (si-prin'ō-don), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyprinodontidae. II. n. Same as cyprinodontid.

cyprinodontid (si-prin'ō-don'tid), n. A fish of the family Cyprinodontidae.

Cyprinodontidae (si-prin'ō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < ('Cyprinodon + -idae).] A family of haplousomous fishes, typified by the genus Cyprinodon. The head and body are covered with scales, the margin of the upper jaw is formed by the intermaxillaries only, there are teeth in both jaws; the upper and lower pharyngeals have cardiform teeth; the dorsal fin is situated on the hinder half of the body; the stomach is without a blind sac, and the pyloric appendages are absent. Many of them are known as killifishes, mosquitofishes, etc. — Cyprinodontidae carnivorae, in Günther's classification of fishes, the first group of Cyprinodontidae, characterized by the bones of each mandibular being firmly united, and the intestinal tract short or but little convoluted. Cyprinodontidae limnophages, in Günther's classification of fishes, a group of Cyprinodontidae, characterized by the bones of each mandibular not being united (the dentary being movable), and the intestinal canal with numerous convolutions. The sexes are differentiated.

Cyprinodontina (si-prin'ō-don-ti-nā), n. pl. [NL., < ('Cyprinodon + -ina).] In Günther's classification of fishes, a subgroup of Cyprinodontidae carnivorae, in which the anal fin of the male is not modified into an intromittent organ, and the teeth are incisor-like and notched.

cyprinodontoid (si-prin'ō-don'toid), a. and n. [Cf. Cyprinodon + -oid.] I. a. Same as cyprinodont.

II. n. Same as cyprinodontid.

cyprinoid (sip'ri-noid), a. and n. I. a. Carp-like; cyprine; pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyprinidae.

II. n. A carp or carp-like fish; a fish of cyprinoid character; one of the Cyprinoidae.

Cyprinoidae (sip-ri-noi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < ('Cyprinus + -oidae).] A superfamily of plectro-spondylous fishes, embracing the families Cyprinidae (carps, etc.), Homalopteridae (East Indian fishes), Catostomidae (suckers), and Cobitidae (loaches).

cyprinoidae (sip-ri-noi'dē-ān), a. and n. [Cf. Cyprinoidae + -an.] I. a. Of cyprinoid character; cyprinoid.

II. n. One of the Cyprinoidae.

Cyprinus (si-prī'nus), n. [NL., < L. cyprinus, < Gr. κυπρινος, a carp.] The typical genus of the family Cyprinidae; the carps proper. The genus has varied within wide limits. By Linnaeus and the old authors all the eventronathous fishes, as cyprinids, catostomids, and cobitids, with some others, were included. It gradually underwent delimitation by many zoologists, and is now generally restricted to the carp. The common cultivated carp is C. carpio, of which there are many varieties. C. auratus is the common goldfish, but it belongs properly to a very distinct genus, Carassius. See carp.

Cypriot (sip'ri-ot), n. See Cypriot. Cypriot (sip'ri-ot), n. and a. [F. Cypriot, Cypriot = It. Cipriotto, < L. Cyprus, Cyprus, < Cyprus, Cyprus.] I. n. 1. An inhabitant of Cyprus, a large island lying in the eastern part of the Mediterranean, and forming part of the Turkish empire, though occupied and administered by Great Britain since 1878; specifically, one of the primitive race of inhabitants, Greek in language and affinity. — 2. The Greek dialect of Cyprus.

II. a. Of or belonging to the island of Cyprus. — Cypriot alphabet, a syllabic character, of disputed origin, used anciently for writing the Cypriot Greek dialect. — Cypriot pottery, a class of pottery found in the island of Cyprus; specifically, the ancient vessels, of a somewhat coarse baked clay, found generally in tombs, Cypriot Pottery.

and showing in their form and in their decoration, whether geometric or derived from animal or vegetable types, etc., a close affiliation to important series of pottery made on the mainland of Greece and Asia, and in other islands, as Rhodes and Thera. This pottery is important for the tracing of connecting links between the art of Greece and that of other lands, as, for instance, in its exhibition of the gradual modification and Hellenization of the Egyptian lotus as a decorative motive.

Also Cyprian.

cypridin (sip-ri-pē'din), n. [Cf. ('Cypridium + -in).] The precipitate formed when water is added to a strong tincture prepared from the roots of plants of the genus Cypridium.

Cypridium (sip-ri-pē'di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. κύπρις, Aphrodite (see 'Cyprina), + ιδιον, a plain, < ιδίον, the ground, akin to τοίς (τοδ) = E. foot.] A genus of orchids, remarkable for having the two lateral anthers perfect, while the third forms a dilated fleshy appendage above the stigma. The lip is large and sacrate or somewhat slipper-shaped, whence the common names lady's slipper and (in the United States) morcan-flower. There are about 40 species, ranging from the tropics to the colder temperate regions of the northern hemisphere. A single species, C. Calceola, is rarely found in Great Britain; 10 species occur in the United States; but the larger number belong to the tropics of America. The tropical species generally have thick, veinless leaves; and several of them are in frequent cultivation in greenhouses, where their forms have been largely increased in number by hybridization.

Cypris (si'pris), n. [NL., < L. Cypris, < Gr. κύπρις, Venus (Aphrodite); see Cyprina.] The typical genus of ostracodes, of the family Cyprididae.

The species are among the numerous and varied forms of minute fresh-water crustaceans known as water-bees, swarming in ditches, pools, and other stagnant waters. Their shells abound in a fossil state, in fresh-water strata, from the Carboniferous formation upward.

cyprus<sup>1</sup> (si'prus), n. [L., < Gr. κύπρος, a tree growing in Cyprus, supposed to be the same as the Heb. gopher, < קופר, Cyprus. A different word and tree from cyprus<sup>2</sup> (L. cupressus), with which in E. it has been confused; see cyprus<sup>2</sup>.] The Latin name of a tree, Lawsonia alba, the common henna, growing in Cyprus and Egypt, yielding a fragrant oil.

A Species of Cypris, highly magnified.
A, I, II, antennules and antennae; M, I, II, III, mandibles and maxillae; A, mandibular appendage; P, I, II, thoracic pedicels; A, mandibular palpi; C, caudal end; S, eye.

cyrenoid (si'pree-oid), n. The blackcap, or European black-capped warbler, Sylvia or Curruca atricapilla.

cyrrite (si'pree-it), n. [Irreg. < Cyrrus + -ite.] An iron sulphate occurring in yellow incrustations in western Cyprus.

Cyrrus turpentine. See Urtica turpentine, under Urtica.

cyrrula (sip'se-lū), n.; pl. cyrrulae (-lū). [NL., < Gr. κυρρῆ, any hollow vessel, the hollow of the ear (cf. cyrrhella), prob. akin to κυρρῆ, a cup: see cup.] In bot., an achene with an adnate calyx, as in the Compositae.

Cypseli (sip'se-li), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. cypselus, a swift: see Cypselus.] A superfamily group of picarian birds, approximately equal to the Macrochiroes of Nitzsch, and now usually consisting of the three families Cypselidae, Trochilidae, and Caprimulgidae: same as Cypseloides, Cypseliformes, or Cypselomorpha.

Cypselidae (sip'se-li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < (Cypselus + -idae).] A family of fuscirostral macrochiran non-passerine birds; the swifts. The technical characters are: a very small, deeply cleft, unbristled bill, with exposed nostrils; extremely long pointed wings, with graduated primaries and short secondaries; small weak feet, unfitted for progression, frequently with an abnormal ratio of the phalanges; enormously developed salivary glands; the sternum entire behind; the furculum U-shaped; no caeca; the leg-muscles anomalous; and several narrowly oval, white eggs. The swifts are a well-marked family of from 8 to 8 genera and about 50 species, resembling swallows, and often so-called. They are divided into two subfamilies, Cypselinae and Chaeturae. See cuts under Chaetura and Cypselus.

Cypseliform (sip'se-li-form), a. [NL., Cypseliformis, < L. cypselus, a swift, + forma, shape.] Having the form or structure of a swift; resembling the Cypselidae. Also Cypselomorph.

Cypseliformes (sip'se-li-fōr-mēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Cypseliformis: see Cypseliform.] A superfamily of macrochiran non-passerine birds, containing the swifts, gnatcatchers, and humming-birds; the long-handed series of picarian birds: nearly the same as the Macrochiroes, and the same as the Cypseloides of Blyth and Cypselomorpha of Huxley. The syrinx has not more than one pair of intrinsic muscles, the palate is agilligathous, the oil gland is nude; the legs are anomalously gonatous; the sternum is broad, deeply keeled, entire or notched behind; the tail has 10 rectrices, the distal segments of the wing are greatly elongated in comparison with the proximal one, and the pinnion bears 10 rapidly graduated flight feathers, producing a long, pointed wing; the feet are small, scarcely serviceable for progression, with variously modified digits, sometimes of abnormal ratio of phalanges, but neither syndactyl nor zygodactyl; and the hind toe is elevated or reversed in some forms, in which also the front toes may be semi-palmate. The bill shows two diverse types, being telmistratal in the humming-birds and fuscirostral in the swifts and gnatcatchers. The group is contrasted among picarian birds with the Cuculiformes and the Proceriformes.

Cypselinus (sip'se-li-nē), n. pl. [NL., < (Cypselus + -inus).] A subfamily of Cypselidae; the typical swifts. The ratio of the phalanges is abnormal, all the front toes being 3 jointed with very short basal phalanges; the hallux is reversed or lateral; and the feet are more or less completely feathered. It contains about 25 species, chiefly of the genus Cypselus, and mostly of the old world. Panyptila is the leading American form. See cut under Cypselus.

Cypseline (sip'se-lin), a. [(< (Cypselus + -ine).] Swift-like; having the characters of a swift; pertaining to the family Cypselidae or genus Cypselus.

Cypseloid (sip'se-loid), a. [NL., Cypseloides, < Gr. κυρρῆ, a swift, + ειδός, form.] Resembling a swift; cypseliform; specifically, pertaining to the superfamily Cypseloides.

Cypseloides (sip'se-loi-dēs), n. [NL.: see Cypseloid.] 1. A genus of swifts, of the family Cypselidae and subfamily Chaeturae, having the phalanges of the toes normal, the tarsi naked, and the tail forked, its feathers not mucronate. — 2. [Used as a plural.] In Blyth's classification of birds (1846), a series or superfamily of his Streptopores heterodactyl, consisting of the podargues and moth-hunters, or Podargidae and Caprimulgidae, grouped together under the name Parvirostres, and of the swifts and humming-birds, Cypselidae and Trochilidae, grouped together under the name Telmistrates.

Cypselomorph (sip'se-lō-mōrf), n. One of the Cypselomorphae.

Cypselomorpha (sip'se-lō-mōrf), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κυρρῆ, a swift, + μορφή, form.] In Huxley's system of classification (1867), a group of megithognathous birds, the same as Cypseli, Cypseloides, or Cypseliformes, considered as connecting the Cuculomorphae and the Coccyomorphae. The technical characters are: a broad, deeply carinate sternum, entire or singly or doubly notched behind, without a furcate manubrium; a rudimentary hypo-didium or none; no expanded scapular and of the clavicle; and not more than one pair of intrinsic syringeal muscles. Cypselomorphia (sip'se-lō-mōrf'ik), a. [As Cypselomorpha + -ia.] Same as Cypseliform. Cypselus (sip'se-lus), n. [NL., < L. cypselus, < Gr. κυρρῆ, the swift.] The typical genus of swifts, of the family Cypselidae and subfamily Common European Swift (Cypselus apus).

Cypselinae, having the hind toe versatile and the tarsi feathered. There are numerous species, chiefly of the old world. C. apus is the common swift of Europe.

Cyrena (si-rē-nā), n. [NL., < L. Cyrene, Gr. Κυρήνη, a name of several nymphs.] The typical genus of mollusks of the family Cyrenidae. Lamarck, 1800.

Cyrenale (si-rē-nā'ik), a. and n. [< L. Cyrenalis, < Gr. Κυρήνη, < Κυρήνη, L. Cyrene.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to Cyrene, an ancient Greek city, capital of Cyrenaica, on the north coast of Africa. — 2. Pertaining to or belonging to the (Greek school of hedonistic philosophy established by Aristippus of Cyrene, a disciple of Socrates. According to Aristippus, pleasure is the only rational aim, and the relative values of different pleasures are to be determined by their relative intensities and durations. He maintained also that cognition is limited to sensation.

There is not that sect of Philosophers among the heathen so dissolute, no, not Epicurus, nor Aristippus with all his Cyrenaeic rant, but would shut his school doors against such greasy sophisms.

Milton, Church-Government, II, Concl

Also Cyrenium. II. n. One of the Cyrenaic school of philosophers. See I., 2.

Cyrenalism (si-rē-nā-i-sim), n. [(< Cyrenais + -ism).] The doctrines of the Cyrenaic philosophers. See Cyrenais, a., 2.

Cyrenian (si-rē-ni-an), a. and n. [(< Cyrena + -ian; L. Cyrenensis, Cyrenais, etc.: see Cyrenais.] 1. a. Same as Cyrenais.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Cyrene. See Cyrenais.

They laid hold upon one Simon, a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross.

Luke xlii. 26.

cyrenid (si-ren'id), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Cyrenidae.

Cyrenidae (si-ren'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyrena + -idae.] A family of siphonate lamellibranchiate mollusks, typified by the genus Cyrena. They have a sub-circular shell, an external ligament, and several hinge-teeth. The animal has separate short siphons, a large compressed foot, and triangular palpi; the shell has 2 or 3 cardinal teeth and anterior as well as posterior ones, and an external npraised ligament. The species are inhabitants of fresh or brackish waters. By many conchologists the species are associated in one family with the Cycladidae or Sphaeriidae. Also Corbiculidae.

Right Valve of Cyrena cyrenoides.

In fresh waters the world over occurs a group of usually small bivalve shells, covered with an amber or brown epidermis, while in the brackish waters of warmer countries occur some larger forms. The family under which these are assembled is variously known as Cycladidae or Cyrenidae, the latter name being preferable.

Stand. Nat. Hist., I, 275.

Cyrtolaceae (sir-i-lā'sē-sē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyrtilla, the typical genus (prob. < Cyrtillus, Cyrtill), + -aceae.] A natural order of small evergreen dicotyledonous trees or shrubs, of uncertain relationship, but now placed among the polypetalous orders, near the Thymales. There are about 6 known species, constituting 4 genera, all natives of North or tropical America. Cyrtilla, Chitonella, and Altiotia, each of a single species, are found in the southern United States, with fragrant white flowers in racemes, and heavy and compact wood, whence the common name of ironwood.

Cyrtillie (si-ril'ik), a. [(< L.L. Cyrtillus, < Gr. Κυρτῖλος, a proper name, Cyrtill.] Of or pertaining to St. Cyril; specifically, noting an alphabet adopted by the Slavic peoples belonging to the Eastern Church, invented by Cyril and Methodius, the apostles of the Slavs, in the ninth century. It is believed to have superseded the Glagolitic as being easier both for the copyist to write and for the foreigner to acquire. Some of its signs are modified from the Glagolitic, but those which Greek and Slavic have in common are taken from the Greek. It was brought into general use by St. Cyril's pupil, Clement, first bishop of Bulgaria. The Russian alphabet is a slight modification of it.

cyrtologist (sir'i-ō-lōj'ik), a. [Also formerly curtologia; < Gr. κυρτολογία, speaking literally (applied to hieroglyphics which consist of simple pictures, not symbols, of the things meant), < κυρτός, authorized, legitimate, proper, vernacular, lit. having power (see church), + -λογία, < λογος, speak.] 1. Relating to hieroglyphics of a certain sort (see etymology). — 2. Relating or pertaining to capital letters.

Cyrtellaria (sēr-tē-lā'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κυρτός, curved, arched, + dim. -ella + -aria.] A family or an order of nasellarian radiolarians, having a complete lattice-shell enveloping the central capsule. It is divided into the sub-orders Spyroidea, Botryodea, and Cyrtodea.

Cyrtida (sēr'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κυρτός, curved, arched, + -ida.] A family of monopyllean radiolarians, having a siliceous skeleton in the form of a monaxon or triradial test. See Eucyrtididae. Haeckel.

Cyrtoceran (sēr-tōs'ē-ran), a. [Irreg. < Cyrtoceras + -an.] Same as Cyrtoceratite.

Cyrtoceras (sēr-tōs'ē-ras), n. [NL., < Gr. κυρτός, curved, arched, + κερας, horn.] A genus of fossil cephalopods having the shell bent or bowed. Also Cyrtocera, Cyrtocera, Cyrtoceras, Cyrtoceras, and Cyrtoceratites.

Cyrtoceratid (sēr-tōs'ē-rā-tid), n. A cephalopod of the family Cyrtoceratidae.

Cyrtoceratidae (sēr'tō-sē-rā-ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < (Cyrtoceras + -idae) + -ida.] A family of nautiloid cephalopods, typified by the genus Cyrtoceras. The shell is arched, the siphon small and subcentral or submarginal, and the aperture simple. Numerous species inhabited the Paleozoic seas. Generally associated with the Nautilidae.

Cyrtoceratite (sēr-tō-sē-rā-ti-tē), n. [(< Cyrtoceras + -cerat) + -ite.] A fossil cephalopod of the genus Cyrtoceras.

Cyrtoceratite (sēr-tō-sē-rā-ti-tē), a. [(< Cyrtoceratite + -ic.] Having the character of a cyrtoceratite; bent or bowed, as certain fossil cephalopods: opposed to orthoceratite. Also Cyrtoceran.

cyrtolite (sēr'tō-lit), n. [(< Gr. κυρτός, curved, + λίθος, stone.) A mineral related to silex in form and composition, but hydrous, and perhaps resulting from its alteration. The faces of the crystals are commonly convex, whence the name.

cyrtometer (sēr-tōm'ē-tēr), n. [(< Gr. κυρτός, curved, bent, + μετρον, a measure.) An instrument for ascertaining the size and shape of the chest.

The cyrtometer is used for delineating the external contour of the chest and for exact comparison of one side with the other. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXV, 128.

Cyrtomys (sēr'tō-niks), n. [NL. (J. Gould, 1845), < Gr. κυρτός, curved, arched, + μῦς, nail.]

Mammal Quail or Partridge (Cyrtomys mazama).

A genus of American partridges or quails, the harlequin quails, of the family Tetraonidae and subfamily Montophrinae or Ortyinae: so-called from the large curved claws. The bill is very stout, the head crested, the tail so short that the rectrices are almost hidden by the coverts, and the wing-coverts and inner secondaries elongated, covering the primaries when the wing is closed. The type is the Massena quail or partridge of the southwestern United States and Mexico (C. massena), a handsome species, the male of which has the face curiously striped with black and white, the under parts being velvety black and mahogany brown crowded with circular white spots.

Oyrtophyllum (sēr-tō-fl'um), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐρτυγος, curved, arched, + φυλλον, leaf.] A genus of orthopterous insects, of the family Leucostictidae, of large size, green color, broad foliaceous wings, and arboreal habits; the katydids. There are a dozen species in the United States (C. concavus is the common katydid). Also Oyrtophyllum Burmeister, 1888. See cat under katydid.

cyst (sist), n. [< NL. cystis, < Gr. κυστις, the bladder, a bag, pouch, < κυσσιν, conceive, be pregnant, orig. hold, contain. (f. cyma).] 1. In anat., a bladder; a large vesicle.—2. In pathol., a bladder-like bag or vesicle in animal bodies which includes morbid matter.

The larval form of tape worm which is commonly developed in cysts of the liver of the mouse and the rat (Owen, Anat., v).

3. In zool., a hydatid; a cystic worm, or encysted state of a tapeworm.—4. In cryptogamiae bot., a cell or cavity, usually including other cells or reproductive bodies, as an envelop enclosing a group of diatoms or desmids, or a cell containing an anthozoid; in certain algae, a spore-case. See conocyst.

Sometimes, improperly, cist.
Dermoid cyst. See dermoid. Ovarian cyst. See ovarian.

cystadenoma (sis'ta-dō-nō'mā), n.; pl. cystadenomata (-mā-tā) [NL., < cystis, cyst, + adenoma.] An adenoma in which cysts are formed.

cystalgia (sis-tal'jā), n. [NL., < Gr. κυστις, bladder, + αλγία, pain.] In pathol., pain in the urinary bladder: especially applied to pain coming in paroxysms.

cystatrophia (sis-ta-trō'fī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. κυστις, bladder, + τροφία, atrophy.] In pathol., atrophy of the bladder. Dunlop.

cystectomy (sis-tek'ta-si), n. [(< Gr. κυστις, bladder, + εκτομή, extension, < εκτείνω, extend: see extend).] 1. Dilatation of the bladder.—2. In surg., a form of lithotomy in which a dilator is introduced through an incision in the membranous portion of the urethra, and forcibly dilates the prostatic portion to an extent sufficient to allow of the extraction of the stone. Also called lithotomy.

cysted (sis'ted), a. [cyst + -ed<sup>2</sup>.] Inclosed in a cyst; encysted.

cystelminth (sis-tel-minth), n. [(< Gr. κυστις, a bladder (see cyst), + ελμινθ (see elmint), a worm.)] A cystic worm.

cystenchyma, cystenchyme (sis-teng'ki-mā, -kim), n. [NL. cystenchyma, < Gr. κυστις, a bladder (see cyst), + χυμα, an infusion.] A kind of connective tissue occurring in some sponges, in some respects resembling certain kinds of vegetable parenchyma, consisting of closely adjacent oval cells of large size with thin walls and fluid contents.

Cystenchyma very commonly forms a layer just below the skin of some (lepidodermis), and as on tracing the cortex . . . a large number of refracting fluid globules immiscible with water are set free, it is just possible that it is sometimes a fatty tissue. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII 419.

cystenchymatous (sis-teng-kim'a-tus), a. [cystenchyma (-t) + -ous.] Having the character or quality of cystenchyma; containing or consisting of cystenchyma.

cystenchyma, n. See cystenchyma.
Cysteoides (sis-tō'idēs), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Cystoidea.

cystic (sis'tik), a. [= F. cystique = Sp. cístico = Pg. cístico = It. cistico, < NL. cysticus, < cystis, a cyst: see cyst.] 1. In anat., pertaining to a cyst, in any sense. Specifically (a) Pertaining to the hepatic cyst or gall bladder, as the cystic duct (conveying gall into the gall bladder), the cystic artery (a branch of the hepatic artery going to the gall bladder), the cystic plexus of nerves, a cystic concretion, a cystic remora. (b) Pertaining to the urinary bladder.

2. Resembling a cyst; cystoid; vesicular; bladderly.—3. Having a cyst or cysts: full of cysts; cystose: as, a cystic tumor.—4. In zool., encysted; cysticeroid; hydatid: specifically applied to the encysted or hydatid state of any tapeworm (Tenia): opposed to cercoid (which see).

Also, improperly, cushe.

Cystic worm, or bladder-worm, a hydatid or scolex of a tapeworm, which may be a cysticerous with one tentacle, or a scolex or scolocoelous with several such heads. See these words, and cut under tenia.

cystic (sis'tik), a. [cyst (syn.) + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from cystin. Cystic acid, C<sub>12</sub>H<sub>10</sub>O<sub>8</sub>, a substance occurring in rare cases in urinary calculi which have a crystalline structure and are insoluble in water, alcohol, and ether: same as cystin.

Cystica (sis'ti-kā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of cysticus: see cystic.] An old name of cystic worms, hydatids, or cysticeri, collectively, given when these were supposed to be a natural group of mature organisms. Rudolphi.

cysticeroid (sis-ti-sōr'kōid), a. and n. [cysticerus + -oid.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to a cysticerous or other larva of a tapeworm; hydatid.

II. n. The hydatid or encysted state of the larva of any tapeworm.

The dog devours the louse and the cysticeroid becomes a Tenia cucumina in his intestine. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 187.

cysticerous (sis-ti-sēr'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. κυστις, bladder (see cyst), + κέρως, tail.] A cystic worm or bladder-worm; a hydatid; an encysted scolex or tenia-head; the encysted state of the larva of a tapeworm. The name was originally given as a generic term under the impression that the so-called Cysticerus cellulosus was a distinct genus and species of a parasite. It is the larva of the Tenia solium, found in man, pork, and developing in man into the tapeworm. It has but one tentacle head in the cyst, and the term cysticerus is retained as a convenient designation of such larvae. Thus, the cysticerous of the ox becomes in man Tenia mediocanellata, the Cysticerus parviformis of the rabbit becomes Tenia seriala of the dog, wolf, or fox; the Cysticerus fascicularis of the rat and mouse develops in the cat as Tenia cranialis. The cystic worm of Tenia canis of the dog has many heads, and is known as a cercine, and the Cercaria o. rebus is found in the brain of sleep. Another form of many headed cystic worm, complicated by proliferation, is the larva of Tenia echinococcus of the dog, known as an echinococcus. Echinococcus is a term now being found in the liver of man as well as of various domestic animals. See tenia, cercaria, echinococcus, and nolet.

cysticle (sis'ti-kl), n. [NL. **cysticula*, dim. of cystis, a cyst: see cyst.] A small cyst.

In some. At least the cysticles are not complicated with pigment cells. Owen, Anat., v.

cystid (sis'tid), n. [(< Gr. κυστις, a bladder (see cyst), < κυστις: see cyst.] In Polysyll.: (a) The sacular, planuliform, ciliated embryo, from one end of which one or more polypids are developed from thickenings of the wall of the sac.

The cystid is comparable to a vesicular morula. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 396.

(b) The cell in which the body of the mature individual is contained, as distinguished from the polypid itself.

The body and tentacles apparatus has been incorrectly regarded as a kind of individual, and opposed to the cell or cystid in which it is placed, as the polypid. Class, Zoology (1896), II 73.

cystide (sis'tid or -tid), n. [cystidium.] 1. Same as cystidium.—2. In fungi of the family Trichia, same as paraphyma.

Cystidea, Cystideum (sis-tid'ē-ā, -ō), n. pl. [NL.] An order of fossil crinoids: synonymous with Cystodea (which see).

cystidean (sis-tid'ē-an), n. [Cystidea + -an.] A cystic crinoid; an crinoid of the order Cystidea.

cystides, n. Plural of cystis.

cystidia, n. Plural of cystidium.
cystidicolous (sis-ti-dik'ō-lus), a. [Irreg. (< Gr. κυστις (κυστις), a bladder (see cyst), + λόγος, inhabit.) Inhabiting a cyst, as a cystic worm.

cystidium (sis-tid'i-um), n.; pl. cystidia (-jā) [NL. < Gr. κυστις, bladder, + dim. -idium.] In hymenomycetous fungi, a large spherical or ovoid cell which originates among the basidia and paraphyses, and projects beyond them. It is considered to be a sterile basidium. Also cystide.

cystidoparalysis (sis'ti-dō-pā-rāl'i-sis), n. [NL.] See cystoparalysis.

cystidoplegia (sis'ti-dō-plē'jā), n. [NL.] See cystoplegia.

cystifelleotomy (sis-ti-fel'ē-ōt'ō-mī), n. [(< Gr. κυστις, bladder, + λίη (felle) (= Gr. χολή), gall, + Gr. τομή, a cutting: see anatomy.] Same as cholecystotomy.

cystiferous (sis-tif'ē-rus), a. [NL. cystis, bladder (see cyst), + φέρω = E. bear.] Having or producing cysts; cystogenous.

cystiform (sis'ti-form), a. [NL. cystis, bladder (see cyst), + forma, shape.] 1. Having the form or character of a cyst; cystic in form.—2. Encysted; hydatid; cysticeroid: as, a cystiform worm.

cystignathid (sis-tig'nā-thid), n. A toad-like amphibian of the family Cystignathidae.
Cystignathidae (sis-tig-nā-thīdēs), n. pl. [NL., < Cystignathus + -idae.] A family of anurous salient amphibians, typified by the genus Cystignathus, with toothed upper jaw and subocular or little dilated sacral diapophyses. It is one of the largest families of the order, with 26 genera and 160 species, representing great diversity in mode of life, some being terrestrial or arboreal and others aquatic. It is represented only in the Australian and Neotropical regions.

Cystignathus (sis-tig'nā-thus), n. [NL., < Gr. κυστις, bladder (see cyst), + γνάθος, jaw.] The typical genus of toads of the family (Cystignathidae). C. nectatus is an example. Also Cystognathus, Wagler, 1830.

cystin (sis'tin), n. [(< Gr. κυστις, bladder, + -in<sup>2</sup>.] A substance ( $C_{12}H_{10}NO_8$ ) crystallizing in colorless six-sided plates, and constituting a rare kind of urinary calculus.

Cystiphyllidae (sis-ti-flī'dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cystiphyllum + -idae.] A family of Paleozoic rugose stone-corals, of the order Sclerodermata and group Rugosus. The corallum is simple, rarely compound, the septa are very rudimentary, and the visceral chamber is filled with little vesicles formed by combined tabulae and dissepiments. Edwards and Hame, 1880.

Cystiphyllum (sis-ti-flī'um), n. [NL., < Gr. κυστις, bladder, + φυλλον, leaf.] The typical genus of fossil stone-corals of the family (Cystiphyllidae). Murchison, 1830. Also Cystophyllum, Dana, 1846.

cystirrhagia (sis-ti-rē'jā), n. [NL., < Gr. κυστις, bladder, + ραγία, (< ρηγναι, break.)] In pathol.: (a) Hemorrhage from the bladder. (b) Cystirrhoea.

cystirrhoea, cystirrhoea (sis-ti-rō'ē), n. [NL. cystirrhoea, < Gr. κυστις, the bladder, + ρροια, a flowing, (< ρρῖν, flow.)] In pathol., a discharge of mucus from the bladder; venical catarrh. Also cystorrhoea, cystorrhoea.

cystis (sis'tis), n.; pl. cystides (-ti-dēs). [NL.: see cyst.] Same as cyst.

Cystiscidae (sis-tis'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < (Cystiscus + -idae.)] A family of pectinibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Cystiscus. The shell is undistinguishable from that of a marginellid, but the teeth of the radula are peculiar, being in one row, transverse, multispined, and with three or more longer than the others. The species are of small size and inhabitants of various seas.

Cystiscus (sis-tis'kus), n. [NL. (Stimpson, 1865), dim. of Gr. κυστις, bladder: see cyst.] The typical genus of Cystiscidae.

cystitis (sis'ti'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. κυστις, the bladder, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the bladder.

cystitome (sis'ti-tōm), n. [NL. cystis, Gr. κυστις, cyst (with reference to the cystis or capsule of the crystalline lens), + τομή, cutting. Cf. cystotome.] In surg., an instrument for opening the capsule of the crystalline lens.

cystobubonocoele (sis'tō-bū-bō'nō-sēl), n. [(< Gr. κυστις, bladder, + βουβων, the groin, + κύλη, tumor.)] In surg., a rare kind of hernia, in which the urinary bladder protrudes through the inguinal opening.

cystocarp (sis'tō-kārp), n. [(< Gr. κυστις, bladder, + καρπ, fruit.)] The sexual fruit of algae of the order Florideae, consisting of spores either without a special membranous envelop or contained within a conceptacle or pericarp. Also cystocarpus, apocarpus.

cystocarpic (sis'tō-kār'pik), a. [cystocarp + -ic.] Consisting of cystocarps; having the character of a cystocarp.

In Nemalion the cystocarpic fruit is a globular mass of spores. Partsch, Marine Algae, p. 20.

Cystocarpic spore, a cystocarpic spore.
cystocoele (sis'tō-sēl), n. [(< Gr. κυστις, bladder, + κύλη, tumor.)] A hernia or rupture formed by the protrusion of the urinary bladder.

cystococcoid (sis'tō-kōk'oid), a. [Cystococcus + -oid.] Resembling algae of the genus Cystococcus.

Cystococcus (sis-tō-kōk'us), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + coccus, berry.] A genus of the lowest chlorophyll-green fresh-water algae, consisting of spherical cells, single or united in small families. They are common on damp earth, bark of trees, etc., and are thought to constitute the gonidia of some lichens.

cystocyte (sis-tō-sit), n. [Gr. cystis, a bladder (see cyst), + cyto, a hollow, a cavity (cell).] In sponges, one of the large cyst-like cells of the cystenchyma, filled with fluid, and containing a nucleus with its included nucleolus supported in the fluid contents by fine protoplasmic threads which extend to the inner surface of the cell-wall and there spread out in a film.

cystodynia (sis-tō-din'i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + dynē, pain.] In pathol., pain in the bladder.

cystofibroma (sis-tō-fī-brō'mā), n.; pl. cystofibromata (-mā-tā). [NL., < cystis + fibroma.] A fibroma containing cysts.

cystogenesis (sis-tō-jen'e-sis), n. [Gr. cystis, bladder (see cyst), + genesis, origin.] Same as cytogenesis.

cystogenous (sis-toj'e-nus), a. [Gr. cystis, bladder (see cyst), + genos, producing; see -genous.] Producing or bearing cells; cystiferous.

cystoid (sin'toid), a. [cyst + -oid.] 1. Presenting the appearance of a cyst; cystiform.—2. Pertaining to the Cystoidea; cystoidean.

Cystoidea (sis-toi-dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + eidōs, form.] An order of fossil crinoids, encrinurids or stone-lilies, having a rounded body inclosed in many pentagonal sutured plates, a jointed stalk, and a lateral orifice closed by a pyramid of jointed plates. The order is correlated with Blattoides and Crinoides. See Crinoides, 2. Also Cystoidea, Cystoidea, Cystoidea.

cystoidean (sis-toi-dē-ān), a. and n. 1. a. Having the character of a cystoid crinoid; specifically, of or pertaining to the Cystoidea.

II. n. A member of the Cystoidea.

cystolith (sis-tō-lith), n. [Gr. cystis, bladder, + lithos, stone.] A Section of Leaf of Ficus elastica, highly magnified.

a, epidermis; b, hypodermis; c, palisade cells; d, spongy parenchyma; e, cystolith. In the epidermal cells of species of Ficus, prolongations of the cell wall occur, at the extremity of which small crystals of carbonate of lime are deposited, to these the name cystoliths has been applied. Encyc. Brit., IV, 40.

cystolithiasis (sis-tō-lith-i-ā-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + lithos, stone, + -iasis.] In pathol., the presence of a stone in the urinary bladder.

cystolithic (sin-tō-lith'ik), a. [Gr. cystis, a bladder, + lithos, a stone (see cystolith and cystolithiasis), + -ic.] In med., relating to stone in the bladder.

cystoma (sis-tō-mā), n.; pl. cystomata (-mā-tā). [NL., < cystis, a cyst, + -oma.] A tumor containing cysts.

cystomorphous (sis-tō-mōr'fus), a. [Gr. cystis, bladder (see cyst), + morphē, form, + -ous.] Cyst-like; cystiform; cystoid.

cystoparalysis (sis-tō-pā-rā-lī-sis), n. [NL., also less prop. cystoparalysis; < Gr. cystis, bladder, + paralysis, paralysis.] In pathol., paralysis of the bladder.

Cystophora (sis-tōf'ō-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + phorā, < phero = E. bear.] The typical genus of the subfamily Cystophorinae, containing only the hooded or bladder-nosed seal of the northern seas, Cystophora cristata.

Cystophorinae (sis-tōf'ō-rī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cystophora + -inae.] A subfamily of Phocidae, or ordinary earless seals, containing the bottle-nosed, bladder-nosed, and elephant seals. They have an inflatable proboscis-like cyst on the snout, accompanied by modifications of the nasal and intermaxillary bones, and 4 incisors in each half of the upper and 2 in each half of the lower jaw. The group consists of the genera Cystophora and Monorhinus, containing respectively the arctic bladder-nosed and the antarctic bottle-nosed seals. See also cut under seal.

cystoplast (sis-tō-plast), n. A nucleated cell having an envelop.

cystoplastic (sis-tō-plas'tik), a. [cystoplasty + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of cystoplasty.

cystoplasty (sis-tō-plas-tī), n. [Gr. cystis, bladder, + plastis, verbal adj. of plassein, form.] A surgical operation for repair of the bladder, as the operation for vesico-vaginal fistula.

cystoplegia (sis-tō-plē'jī-ā), n. [NL., also imp. prop. cystoplegia; < Gr. cystis, bladder, + plegia, a blow, stroke, < plassein, strike. Cf. cystoparalysis.] In pathol., paralysis of the bladder.

cystoplegic (sis-tō-plē'jī-ik), a. [cystoplegia + -ic.] Pertaining to or resembling cystoplegia.

cystoplex (sis-tō-plēk'sī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + plexis, a blow, stroke, < plassein, strike.] Same as cystoplegia.

Cystopteris (sis-tōp'tē-ris), n. [NL. (so called from its bladder-like indusium), < Gr. cystis, bladder, + ptēris, a fern.] A genus of delicate frondose polypodiaceous ferns having the sori borne on the back of the leaf on the middle of a vein and covered with a membranaceous indusium attached only by the base; the bladder-ferns. They are found in cool, damp localities. There are 5 species, of which C. fragilis (the brittle fern) is found from within the arctic circle to Chili, South Africa, and Tasmania. See also cut under bladder-fern.

cystoptosis (sis-tōp'tō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + ptōsis, a falling, < πτειν, fall.] In pathol., prolapse of the mucous membrane of the bladder into the urethra.

Cystopus (sis-tō'pus), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + opus (work), face, appearance.] A genus of parasitic fungi, belonging to the family Peronosporaceae, and characterized by conidia produced in chains on very short conidiophores, forming compact sori upon the supporting leaf. C. candidus is injurious to the cabbage, radish, and other cruciferous plants.

cystorrhoea, cystorrhoea (sis-tō-rō-ē-ā), n. [NL.] Same as cystorrhoea.

cystose (sis-tō-sē), a. [cyst + -ose.] Containing cysts; full of cysts; cystic; bladdery; vesicular.

cystospastic (sis-tō-spas'tik), a. [Gr. cystis, bladder, + spasticos, < spasmos, verbal adj. of spāō, draw back, < spasmos, spasm; see spasm.] In pathol., pertaining to spasm of the bladder.

cystotania (sis-tō-tā-nī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + tania, a tapeworm; see tania.] 1. A tapeworm: so called from the formation of the cysts characteristic of its larval state.—2. [cap.] Same as Tania.

cystotome (sis-tō-tō-mē), n. [= F. cystotome = Fr. cystotome, < Gr. cystis, bladder, + tomē, cutting, < τέμνω, cut. Cf. cystotomus.] A surgical instrument for cutting the bladder. Sometimes improperly called a lithotome.

cystotomy (sis-tō-tō-mī), n. [= F. cystotomie = Sp. cystotomia, < Gr. cystis, bladder, + tomē, cutting, < τέμνω, cut. Cf. cystotome.] In surg., the operation of opening encysted tumors for the discharge of morbid matter; specifically, the operation of cutting into the urinary bladder for the extraction of a stone or for any other purpose.

cystous (sis'tus), a. [cyst + -ous.] Cystic. Dunlopian.

cystula (sis'tū-lā), n.; pl. cystulae (-lā). [NL., dim. of cystis, a cyst; see cyst.] In bot., a round closed apothecium in lichens. The term is also applied to the little open cups on the upper surface of the fronds in plants of the genus Marchantia.

cyste (sīt), n. [Gr. cystis, a hollow, a cavity, as the hold of a vessel, < κύνω, conceive, orig. contain, cf. cyst, cyma.] In bot., a cell; a cytode; especially, a nucleated cell, of whatever character, regarded as the fundamental form-element of all tissues. The word alone is rare, but common in composition, as leucocyte, and regularly in the histology of sponges, as choanocyte, collenocyte, dermoocyte, myocyte, etc.

cytarist, n. An obsolete spelling of cithara.

Cythere (si-thē-rē), n. [NL., < L. Cythere, Cytherea, < Gr. Kytherea, Aphrodite (Venus); see Cytherean.] The typical genus of marine ostracodes of the family Cythereidae. Müller, 1785.

Cytherea (sith-ē-rē-ā), n. [NL., after L. Cytherea, a name of Venus; see Cytherean.] A genus of si-phonate bivalve mollusks, of the family Veneridae, founded by Lamarck in 1806. It is distinguished from Venus by an anterior left lateral tooth. There are numerous species, mostly of the warmer seas.

Cytherean (sith-ē-rē-ān), a. [L. Cythereus, pertaining to Cytherea, Venus, < Gr. Kytherea, Aphrodite; so named from Kythera, L. Cythera, now Cerigo, an island south of Greece, near the coast of which Aphrodite was fabled to have risen from the sea, and where she was specially worshiped.] 1. In myth., pertaining to the goddess Aphrodite (Venus).—2. In astron., pertaining to the planet Venus.

Not only is the apparent movement of Venus across the sun extremely slow, . . . but three distinct atmospheres—the solar, terrestrial, and cytherean—combine to deform outlines and mask the geometrical relations which it is desired to connect with a strict count of time. A. M. Clarke, Astron. in 19th Cent., p. 264.

Cythereidae, Cytheridae (sith-ē-rē-ī-dē, sith-er-ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cythere + -idae.] A family of marine ostracod entomostracous crustaceans, typified by the genus Cythere. They are characterized by the absence of a heart, by having the anterior antennae setose and bent at the base, and the posterior antennae largely developed and hooked; by legs in three pairs; by a furcate abdomen; and by small and lobate foetus. There are several genera besides Cythere.

cytheromania (sith-ē-rō-mā-nī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. Kytherea, Aphrodite (see Cytherean), + mania, madness.] Nymphomania. Dunlopian.

Cytinaceae (sit-i-nā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Cytinus + -aceae.] A small natural order of apetalous, parasitic, fleshy, leafless or scaly plants, allied to the Aristolochiaceae and to Nepenthes. It includes the East Indian genus Rafflesia, remarkable for its gigantic flowers.

Cytinus (sit-i-nus), n. [NL. (from the form and color of the plant), < Gr. κύνω, a hollow.] A small genus of parasitic plants, the type of the Cytinaceae. C. hypocnema, of the Mediterranean region, is of a rich yellow or orange red color, and has been used as an antidote. The other species belong to South Africa and Mexico.

cytioblast (sit-i-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. κύνω, assumed dim. of κύνω, a hollow (cell), + blastos, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytioblast.

A central cytioblast wrapped up in generally radiating protoplasm. H. C. Wood, Fresh Water Algae, p. 152.

cytioblast (sit-i-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. κύνω, assumed dim. of κύνω, a hollow (cell), + blastos, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytioblast.

cytioblast (sit-i-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. κύνω, assumed dim. of κύνω, a hollow (cell), + blastos, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytioblast.

cytioblast (sit-i-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. κύνω, assumed dim. of κύνω, a hollow (cell), + blastos, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytioblast.

cytioblast (sit-i-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. κύνω, assumed dim. of κύνω, a hollow (cell), + blastos, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytioblast.

cytioblast (sit-i-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. κύνω, assumed dim. of κύνω, a hollow (cell), + blastos, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytioblast.

cytioblast (sit-i-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. κύνω, assumed dim. of κύνω, a hollow (cell), + blastos, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytioblast.

cytioblast (sit-i-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. κύνω, assumed dim. of κύνω, a hollow (cell), + blastos, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytioblast.

cytioblast (sit-i-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. κύνω, assumed dim. of κύνω, a hollow (cell), + blastos, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytioblast.

cytioblast (sit-i-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. κύνω, assumed dim. of κύνω, a hollow (cell), + blastos, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytioblast.

Cytinus hypocnema.

plants. It is of a nauseous taste, emetic, and poisonous.

Cytisus (sit'i-sus), n. [NL., < L. cytiscus, a shrubby kind of clover, prob. Medicago arborea (Linnaeus).] A genus of hardy leguminous papilionaceous shrubs, natives almost exclusively of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean.

The leaves are usually composed of three leaflets, but some species are leafless. The large flowers are yellow, purple, or white. (One species, C. scoparius (brown), is an extremely common shrub on uncultivated grounds, heaths, etc., of most parts of Great Britain. Some exotic species are common garden- and shrubbery-plants, as C. purpureus, an elegant procumbent shrub used in rock-work, C. alpinus, etc. See bloom.)

Broom (Cytisus scoparius)
a, flowering branch; b, flower, natural size.
(From Le Moine and DeCandolle's "Traité général de Botanique.")

cytisin (si-ti'is), n. [NL., < Gr. κίτρον, skin (see cutis), + -in.] Same as dermatitis.

cytoblast (si'tō-blást), n. [cyto, a hollow (a cell), + blastos, a sprout, germ.] 1. Same as cytoblast.—2. One of the amebiform cells or cell-elements of the cytoblastema of sponges; a cytode of a sponge.

cytoblastema (si'tō-blás-tē-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. κίτρον, a hollow (a cell), + βλαστήμα, a sprout, germ.] 1. The protoplasm or viscid fluid in which animal and vegetable cells are produced. Hence—2. The blastema or germinal or formative material of a cytode; protoplasmic cell-substance; specifically used of the common gelatinous matrix of protozoans, as sponges.

cytoblastematous, cytoblastemic (si'tō-blástē-mā-tūs, -ik), a. Same as cytoblastematous.

cytoblastomous (si'tō-blás-tō-mūs), a. [cytoblastema + -ous.] Of or pertaining to cytoblastema.

cytocoocus (si'tō-kōk'us), n. [NL., < Gr. κίτρον, a hollow (a cell), + κόκος, a berry.] The kernel of a parent cell; the nucleus of a cytula. A cytocoocus differs from the nucleus of an ordinary cell in that it is supposed to include in itself some of the substance of the spermatocyst by which the female ovum is fecundated and made to become a cytula. Also cytulo-coccus. Haeckel.

cytode (si'tōd), n. [cyto, as if **κυτός*, contr. of **κυτός*, like a hollow, < κίτρον, a hollow (a cell), + -idos, form, shape.] In biol.: (a) A term applied by Haeckel to a unicellular organism or element which has the value of a simple cell, but possesses no distinct nucleus.

It is, nevertheless, a deeply significant fact, that the building stones of the bodies of higher animals are never represented by cytodes, but always by cells.

Frey, Histol. and Histochem (trans.), p. 64.

(b) A cell in general.
I shall, therefore, assume provisionally that the primary form of every animal is a nucleated protoplasmic body, cytode, or cell, in the most general acceptance of the latter term.

cytogenesis (si'tō-jen'ē-sis), n. [cyto, a hollow (a cell), + γενεσις, generation.] Cell-formation; the genesis or development of cells in animal and vegetable organisms; originally used in vegetable physiology. Also cytogenesis, cytogeny.

cytogenetic (si'tō-jē-net'ik), a. [cytogenesis, after γενεσις.] Generating or developing cells; cytogenous; relating to cytogenesis.

cytogenous (si'tō-jē-nūs), a. [cyto, a hollow (a cell), + -γενος, producing: see -genous.] Producing cells; cytogenetic; specifically applied by Kölliker to retiform, reticular, areolar, or ordinary cellular tissue, but properly predicable only of cells themselves, as all other organic structures arise from cells.

cytoid (si'tōid), a. [cyto + -oid.] Cell-like: a term applied by Henle to corpuscles, as of lymph, chyle, etc., which seem to resemble each other essentially in their chemical and microscopical characters. Dungsloer.

Cytophora (si'tō-phō-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κίτρον, a hollow (a cell), + φόρος, < φέρω = E. bear<sup>1</sup>.] A class of protozoans: same as Radiolaria.

cytoplasm (si'tō-plāzm), n. [cyto, a hollow (a cell), + πλάσμα, anything formed. Cf. cytoplasm.] Same as protoplasm.

It [protoplasm] has also received from Beale, Kölliker, and Dujardin respectively, the names bioplasm, cytoplasm, and sarcoid. Frey, Histol. and Histochem (trans.), p. 66.

cytoplasmic (si'tō-plāz'mik), a. [cytoplasm + -ic.] Pertaining to cytoplasm.

Mitaburger refers these phenomena to the necessity of securing for the differentiating reproductive nucleus a definite cytoplasmic medium. Micros. Science, XXVI. 601.

cytopye (si'tō-pi'ē), n.; pl. cytopyga. [NL., < Gr. κίτρον, a hollow (a cell), + πύη, the ramp.] The so-called excretory or anal aperture of unicellular animals. Haeckel.

cytosome (si'tō-stōm), n. [cyto, a hollow (a cell), + σώμα, mouth.] The mouth of a single-celled animal; the oral aperture or orifice of ingestion of unicellular organisms.

cytostomous (si'tō-stō-mūs), a. [cytosome + -ous.] Pertaining to a cytosome.

cytheca (si'tō-thē-kā), n.; pl. cythecae (-sē). [NL., < Gr. κύθος, a hollow (thorax), + θησαυρος, case.] Same as thoracotheca.

Cytosoa (si'tō-sō-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κίτρον, a hollow (a cell), + ζώον, animal.] Same as Sporozoa or Gregarina. See the extract.

With few (if any) exceptions, the falciform young [ar-garines or sporozoa] . . . penetrates a cell of some tissue of its host and there undergoes the first stages of its growth (hence called Cytosoa). Enrye, Brit., XVI. 532.

cyttid (si'tid), n. A fish of the family Cyttidae.

Cyttidae (si'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < cyttus + -idae.] In Günther's classification of fishes, a family of Acanthopterygii cyttoscombriformis, with no bony stay for the prooperculum, an elevated body, two indistinct divisions of the dorsal fin, and an increased number of vertebrae: synonymous with Zenidae.

Cyttina (si'ti-nā), n. pl. [NL., < cyttus + -ina.] In Günther's classification of fishes, the third group of Scombridae. It is characterized by a distinct division of the dorsal fin into two, the spinous being less developed than the soft part, an elevated body, and very small or rudimentary scales. The group was later raised to the rank of a family, Cyttidae.

cyttoid (si'toid), n. [cyttus + -oid.] A fish of the family Cyttidae.

Cyttus (si'tūs), n. [NL. (Günther, 1860), < Gr. κύττος, an unknown fish referred to by Athenaeus in the Deipnosophistae.] A genus of scombroid fishes, giving name to the family Cyttidae.

cytula (si'tū-lā), n.; pl. cytulae (-lā). [NL., dim. of Gr. κίτρον, a hollow, a cavity (a cell).] In biol., a fertilized egg-cell; an impregnated ovum; the parent cell of any organism. It is the ovum of the female, which is fecundated by becoming united with the substance of one spermatozoon, or more, of the male.

The parent-cell (cytula), which was formerly regarded as merely the fertilized egg cell, differs very essentially, therefore, both in point of form (morphologically), and in point of composition (chemically), and lastly also in point of vital qualities (physiologically). Its origin is partly paternal, partly maternal, and we need not, therefore, be surprised when we see that the child which develops from this parent-cell inherits individual qualities from both parents. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), I. 182.

cytulococcus (si'tū-lō-kōk'us), n. [NL., < cytula, q. v., + Gr. κόκος, berry. Cf. cytocoocus.] Same as cytocoocus. Haeckel.

cytuloplasm (si'tū-plāzm), n. [cyto, a hollow (a cell), + Gr. πλάσμα, anything formed, < πλάσσω, form, mold.] The protoplasmic substance of a cytula or fecundated ovule, resulting from the mingling of spermatoplasm with ovoplasm.

cyvar (kē'vār), n. [W. cyfar, lit. joint plowing, < cyf, cy, together = L. com-, co-, + arv, plow; cf. cy, plowed land.] A Welsh measure of land, from one half to two thirds of an acre.

cyvelin (kē've-lin), n. [W. cyvelin, a cubit, half a yard, < cyf, cy, together, + elin, elbow: see ell, elbow.] A Welsh measure of cloth, equal to 9 feet.

Cyzicene (si'zī-sēn), a. [L. Cyzicenus, < Cyzicus, Cyzicum, < Gr. Κύζικος.] Pertaining to the ancient Greek city of Cyzicus in Mysia, Asia Minor.

czar, tsar (sār, tsār), n. [Also written sometimes tsar; prop., according to the Russ. form, tsar, but in E. first and still more usually czar; = D. czar = Dan. Sw. czar = Sp. czar, zar = Pg. czar, tsar = It. czar, after F. czar, also tsar, tsar, through G. tsar, also zar, through OPol. czar, < Russ. tsar, more exactly tsar or tsare (the first letter being ts, the 23d letter of the Russ. alphabet, pron. ts, and the last being ri (mute final i or e), the 29th), = Pol. car (pron. tsar), formerly spelled czar, = Bohem. Serv. Bulg. car (tsar), the name and title of the Emperor of Russia, also applied to the Sultan of Turkey; in fuller form Russ. tsarski, tsarski = Pol. czars = Bohem. czarski = Serv. czar = Croatian czar = Slov. czar = OPol. tsarski, emperor, czar; derived, prob. through the OHG. keisar (MHG. keiser, G. kaiser: see kaiser, czar), from L. czasar, emperor, orig. the cognomen of Julius Czasar: see czasar, and cf. kaiser, with which czar, tsar is ult. identical.] 1. An emperor; a king; specifically, the common title of the Emperor of Russia. In old Russian annals the Mongol prince of Russia from the twelfth century are called czars; the first independent Russian prince to assume the title was Ivan IV., the Terrible, who in 1547 was crowned czar of Moscow. The title czar, though historically equivalent, like its original czar, to emperor, was not recognized as involving imperial rank at the time of its assumption by Ivan; and Peter the Great's assumption of such rank under the title of emperor, in addition to that of czar, was long contested by other powers.

2. An article of dress, apparently a cravat, in use in the early part of the eighteenth century; probably named in compliment to Peter the Great, who visited England in 1698.

czardas (zār'das; Hung. pron. chār'dosh), n. [Hung.] A Hungarian national dance.

czarevitch, tsarevitch (zār'-, tsār'e-vich), n. [= F. czarévitch, tsarévitch = G. tsarévitch, < Russ. tsarévich (the last two letters being ch (ch), the 24th, and er (silent e) the 27th, of the Russ. alphabet), prince, < tsar, emperor: see czar, tsar. Another Russ. form is tsarévich, > G. tsarévitch, F. tsarévitch, E. tsarévitch or czarevitch.] A Russian prince (imperial); formerly applied to any son of the Emperor of Russia, now specifically to the eldest son. Also czarévitch, tsarévitch, czarévitch, czarévitch, and (in another form) czarevitch, czarevitch.

czarevna, tsarevna (zār-, tsār'ev'nā), n. [Russ. tsarevna, princess (imperial), < tsar, emperor: see czar, tsar. Another Russ. form is tsarévna, > G. tsarévna, F. tsarévna, E. tsarévna.] A Russian princess (imperial); formerly applied to any daughter of the czar, now only to the wife of the czarévitch.

czarina, tsarina (zār-, tsār'ev'nā), n. [= F. czarine, tsarine = Sp. czarina, tsarina = Pg. czarina, tsarina = It. czarina = G. czarina, tsarina; < czar, tsar, + fem. term, F. -ine, etc., < G. -in. The Russ. term is tsarina: see czar.] An empress of Russia; the wife of the Czar of Russia, or a Russian empress regnant. Also czarina, tsarina, tsarina.

czarist (zār'ish), a. [czar + -ist.] Pertaining to the Czar of Russia.

His czarist majesty despatched an express to General Golts with an account of these particulars.

Tatler, No. 55

czaritch, tsaritch (zār-, tsār'it'ch), n. [Also tsaritch, < Russ. tsaritch, empress, < tsar, emperor: see czar, tsar.] Same as czarina.

czarowitch, tsarowitch, n. See czarevitch.

Czech (chek; more accurately, chech), n. [Also written Czech, Teck, Techeck (prop., according to the orig., **Check*), < Bohem. (Czech) Chech (the first letter being ch (also written h), pron. ch, and the last h, pron. h) = Russ. Chech = Slov. Chek = Upper Sorbian Chech, Lower Sorbian Teck (> Hung. Csek), a Czech.] 1. A member of the most westerly branch of the great Slavic family of races, the term including the Bohemians, or Czechs proper, the Moravians, and the Slovaks. They number nearly 7,000,000, and live chiefly in Bohemia, Moravia, and northern Hungary.—2. The language of the Czechs, usually called Bohemian. It is closely allied to the Polish. See Bohemian, n., 5.

Czechish (chek'ik), a. and n. [**Chech* + -ic.] 1. a. Of or belonging to the Czechs.

To reunite . . . Bohemia, Moravia, and Austrian Silesia into one Czechish realm. The Nation, XXXVI. 544.

II. n. Same as Czech, 2.

scheme of corresponding characters (compare the preceding letters) is as follows:

The sound which the character has from the beginning being used to represent of the sound of a tooth and mule (or cheek, stop, contact sound) corresponding to t as surd or breathed, and to n as nasal (See the terms used and the letters referred to.) It is generally called a "dental," but with only a conventional propriety, since the teeth bear no part in its production. It involves a closure of the tip of the tongue against the roof of the mouth at a point near to, or even touching, the upper front teeth (while an intoned or voiced current of air is driven during the closure into the cavity of the mouth, as in the case of the other sonant mutes). It is, then, rather a tongue-tip sound, or a front lingual. Sounds closely akin to it are made with different parts of the front tongue against different parts of the forward palate, hence the d is somewhat variously colored in various languages, and in some there are two diverse d's, or even more than two. The d, as belonging to the fundamental or Germanic part of our language, has taken the place of a more original aspirate, namely, San skrit dh, Greek θ, Latin ostent f, thus, English door = Sanskrit dāura = Greek thura = Latin foras. Its regular correspondent in German is t, thus, for (usually written thor) = English door, but, under special conditions, also a d, thus, German cude = English end; German gold = English gold. The German d regularly corresponds to English th. (See th.) Our d has no variety of values; it is, however, not seldom made surd, or pronounced as t, as in packed, tipped, knewed, and the like, being in older words of this kind a substitute, for mechanical uniformity of spelling, for earlier t, misal being formerly misal, misal, Anglo-Saxon misal, misal, formerly misal, misal, Anglo-Saxon cude, etc. See ad = ad, ad = ad.

2. As a numeral, in the Roman system, D stands for 500; when a dash or stroke is placed over it, as D, it stands for 5,000.—3. As a symbol: (a) In music: (1) The second tone, or re, of the scale of C. The ratio between the vibration-numbers of these two tones, when in the relation of do and re, is  $\frac{9}{8}$ . The tone above re is represented by D, the octave above by d, etc. See C, 3. (2) A note which represents this tone. On the treble staff D stands on the first added space below, or on the fourth line (a); and on the bass staff it stands on the third line, or on the second added space above (b). When other clefs are used, the position of D is different. See clef. (3) The key-note of the key of two sharps (c). (4) On the keyboard of the organ or pianoforte, the white key or digital included in each group of two black keys. (5) The string in a stringed instrument that is tuned to the tone D, as the third string of the violin, etc. (b) In chem., D is the symbol of didymium. (c) In math., d is the sign of differentiation,  $\partial$  of partial differentiation,  $\delta$  of variation, D of derivation (commonly in the sense of taking the differential coefficient),  $\Delta$  of differencing, and  $\nabla$  of the Hamiltonian operator. Many analysts avoid the use of the letter in other senses than these. A letter subjoined to any of these signs of operation shows what is taken as the independent variable, and exponents show the number of times the operations are to be performed. Differentiation (especially when relative to the time) was formerly indicated in England by a dot over the sign of the quantity to be differentiated, this being the notation of Newton's fluxional calculus. (d) In the mnemonic words of logic, the sign of reduction to darii.—4. As an abbreviation: (a) In Eng. reckoning (d, or d.), an abbreviation of denarius, the original name for the English penny; as,  $\pounds\ s.\ d.$ , pounds, shillings, and pence;  $2s.\ 1d.$ , two shillings and one penny. (b) Before a date (d.), an abbreviation of diem. (c) In dental formulas, an abbreviation of deciduous, prefixed without a period to the letters i, c, and m: thus, di, deciduous incisor; dc, deciduous canine; dm, deciduous molar: all being teeth of the milk-dentition of a diphyodont mammal. Thus, the milk- or deciduous dentition of a child is expressed by the formula or, more simply, taking one half of each jaw only, d,  $\frac{1}{2}$ , dc,  $\frac{1}{2}$ , dm,  $\frac{1}{2}$   $\times 2 = 20$ . In either case the numbers above the line are those of the upper teeth, and those below the line of the under teeth. See dental. (d) In anat. and ichth. (d, or D), an abbreviation of dorsal (vertebra or fin, respectively). (e) In a ship's log-book (d.), an abbreviation of drizzling.

dabbler (dab'ler), n. 1. One who dabbles or plays in water, or as in water.—2. One who dabbles in or dips slightly into some pursuit, business, or study; a superficial worker or thinker.

In matters of science he [Jefferson] was rather a dabbler than a philosopher.

Theodore Parker, Historic Americans, p. 283.

dabblingly (dab'ling-ly), adv. In a dabbling manner; as a dabbler.

dabby (dab'i), a. [dab'l + -y.] Moist; soft; adhesive. [Local.]

dabchick (dab'chik), n. [A var. of dobchick, dopchick.] 1. A newly hatched or unfledged chick.

As when a dab-chick waddles through the coysie
On feet and wings, and flies, and wades and hops
Pope, Dunciad, ll. 68

Hence—2. A delectable morsel; a childish, tender, delicate person.

She is a delicate dabchick? I must have her
B. Jonson, Alchemist, iv. 1

3. A small grebe; a water-hird of the family Podicepsidae, especially applied in Europe to the Podiceps minor, the little grebe, and in the United States to the Podilymbus podiceps, the Carolina or pied-billed grebe. Also dop-chicken.

lakerlack (dab'er-lak), n. [Sc.] 1. The seaweed Alaria esculenta same as badderlocks.—2. Any wet, dirty strip of cloth or leather.—3. The hair of the head hanging in lank, tangled, and separate locks.

labbia (dab'i-tia), n. The mnemonic name given by Petrus Hispanus to that indirect mood of the first figure of syllogism in which the major premise is universal and affirmative, and the minor premise and conclusion are particular and affirmative. These distinctions of quantity and quality are indicated by the three vowels of the word, a, i, i. The letter s at the end shows that the mood is reduced to direct reasoning by simply converting the conclusion, while the letter d at the beginning shows that the mood to which this reduction leads is darii.

laboya (da-boi'), n. [E. Ind.] A venomous

Daboia russelii.

The second kind of hyena, called papio or dabuh
Topsell (1658)

dab-wash (dab'wash), n. A small wash, done after the regular family wash. [Prov. Eng.]

That great room itself was sure to have clothes hanging to dry at the fire, whatever day of the week it was; some one of the large irregular family having had what was called in the district a dab-wash of a few articles forgotten on the regular day.

da capella (dä kä-pel'la), [It.: da, < L. de, of, from; capella, a chapel; see chapel, n.] In music, a direction to play a piece or passage in church style—that is, with solemnity; in a stately manner.

da capo (da kä'po), [It., from the beginning: da, < L. de, of, from; capo, < L. caput = E. head: see capit.] In music, a direction to repeat from the beginning; usually abbreviated to D. C. The end of the repeat is generally indicated by the word fine. Da capo al fine, a direction to repeat from the beginning to the sign fine.—Da capo al segno, a direction to repeat from the beginning to the sign ♯.

dace (däc), n. [Early mod. E. also dacer, darec; < ME. dacer, darm, < OF. dars, a dace, same as dart, dars, a dart (ML. nom. dardus); E. dard, a dace, ML. acc. dardum, whence also E. dar, darec, a dace; so called from its swiftness: see dart.] 1. A small fresh-water cyprinoid fish of Europe, Leuciscus vulgaris or Squalius laietanus, resembling and closely related to the roach and chub. It has a stout fusiform shape, pharyngeal teeth in two rows, and a complete lateral line. It chiefly inhabits the deep and clear waters of quiet streams in Italy, France, Germany, etc., and some of the rivers of England. It is gregarious and swims in shoals. It seldom exceeds a pound in weight, but from its activity affords the angler good sport. Also called dar, dare, and dart.

Let me live harmlessly, and near the brink
Of Trent or Avon have a dwelling place.
Where I may see my quill or cork down sink,
With ease a bite of perch, or bleak, or dace.

J. Davors, quoted in L. Walton's Complete Angler, v. 1.

2. A name of sundry similar or related fishes.

(a) In some parts of the United States, a cyprinoid fish of the genus Rhinichthys, distinguished by the projection and blackish color of the prenasal region. (b) The redfin, Minimus carassius.

Dacelo (dä-sel'o), n. [NL. (W. E. Leach, 1816), a transposition of L. alcedin, a kingfisher: see Alcedo.] The typical genus of birds of the subfamily Iacoroninae. D. gigas is the large Australian species known as the laughing-jackass.

Dacelonina (dä-sel'o-ni-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Dacelo (n.) + -ina.] One of the two subfamilies of Alcedinidae, having the bill more or less depressed, with smooth, rounded, or sulcate culmen; in the insectivorous, as distinguished from the piscivorous, kingfishers. There are about 14 genera and upward of 80 species, which feed for the most part upon insects, reptiles, and land-mollusks, instead of fish. All are old-world birds; some are African and Asiatic, but most inhabit the Australian, Papuan, and Oceanic regions. Leading genera are Dacelo, Alcedo, Tangara, and Ceryle.

dacey (dä'si), n. The usual name in Bengal, and in sericultural works, of a race of silkworms of which there are eight annual generations.

The silkworm yielding eight crops is found in Bengal, and is there called dacey.

dachshund (G. pron. daks'hönt), n. [G., < dachs, badger, & hund = E. hound.] The German badger-dog; a breed of short-legged, long-bodied dogs used to draw or bait badgers.

Dacian (dä'sian), a. and n. [L. Dacia, the province so called, < Daci = Gr. Δάκται. The L. adj. was Dacus or Dacicus, rarely Dacius.] 1. a. Pertaining or belonging to the Daci, an ancient barbarian people, or to their country, Dacia, made a Roman province after their conquest by Trajan (A. D. 104), comprising part of Hungary, Transylvania, nearly all of Rumania, and some adjacent districts.

There were his young barbarians all at play,
There was their Dacian mother, he, their sire,
Butchered to make a Roman holiday!
Byron, Child Harold, iv. 141.

II. n. One of the Daci; a native of Dacia.

In the time of Trajan were executed the reliefs which represent his victory over the Dacians.

C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 202.

dacite (dä'sit), n. [L. Dacia (see Dacian) + -ite.] A name first used by Fr. Von Hauer and Stache, in 1863, in describing the geology of Transylvania, to include the varieties of greenstone-trachyte which contain quartz. Dacite consists essentially of plagioclase and quartz, together with one or more minerals belonging to the biotite, hornblende, and pyroxene families. The ground mass is very variable in structure and character. Dacite rarely occurs except in a more or less altered form, and is especially interesting as being one of the rocks associated with the occurrence of the precious metals and then used in Transylvania and the Cordilleran regions of North and South America. It is a rock the composition and classification of which has been the cause of much discussion among geologists. See rhyncholite.

dacity (das'i-ti), n. A contraction of audacity.

I have plaid a major in my time with as good dacity as ere a hohly horse on 'em all.

Sampson, Vow Breaker

dacker, daker (dak'er, dä'ker), v. [F. dial. and Sc. (see usually spelled dacker), also decker, dooker; origin obscure; cf. OFlem. dackerren, move quickly, move to and fro, vibrate.] I. intrans. 1. To go about in a careless, aimless, or feeble manner; loiter; saunter.

2. To labor after the regular hours.—3. To traffic; truck.—4. To engage; grapple.

I dacker'd wi' him by myself.
Poems in the Buchan Dialect, p. 7.

5. To search, as for stolen or smuggled goods.

The Nevelians will but doubt he here,
To dacker for her as for robbed gear.
A. Ross, Helenore, p. 91

II. trans. To search; examine; search for (stolen or smuggled goods): as, to dacker a house.

dacker, daker (dak'er, dä'ker), n. [< dacker, daker, v.] A dispute; a struggle.

Dacne (dak'nä), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. δάκναι, bite, sting.] 1. A genus of clavicorn beetles. In its original application it was nearly the same as the modern family Cryptophagidae; in a restricted sense it includes those Cryptophagidae which have the antennae ending in a large orbicular or ovoid and compressed mass.

2. A genus of tetramerous beetles, of the family Erotylidae: same as Engis.

Dacnidae (dak-nid'-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Dacnis (-nid-), 1, + -idae.] A family of birds, typified by the genus Dacnis: synonymous with Corvidae. Cabanis, 1850.

Dacninae (dak-ni-di-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Dacnis (-nid-), 1, + -inae.] A subfamily of Corvidae, typified by the genus Dacnis, containing pitpits with a straight and acute bill and mandibles of equal length. It contains the genera Dacnis, Certhidea, Hemidacnis, Xenodacnis, Conirostrum, and Oreomacnis.

daemidinae (dak-ni-din), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dacninae.

Laughing Kingfisher (Dacelo gigas).

family Iacoroninae. D. gigas is the large Australian species known as the laughing-jackass.

Dacelonina (dä-sel'o-ni-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Dacelo (n.) + -inae.] One of the two subfamilies of Alcedinidae, having the bill more or less depressed, with smooth, rounded, or sulcate culmen; in the insectivorous, as distinguished from the piscivorous, kingfishers. dacite (dä'sit), n. [L. Dacia (see Dacian) + -ite.] A name first used by Fr. Von Hauer and Stache, in 1863, in describing the geology of Transylvania, to include the varieties of greenstone-trachyte which contain quartz. Dacite consists essentially of plagioclase and quartz, together with one or more minerals belonging to the biotite, hornblende, and pyroxene families. The ground mass is very variable in structure and character. Dacite rarely occurs except in a more or less altered form, and is especially interesting as being one of the rocks associated with the occurrence of the precious metals and then used in Transylvania and the Cordilleran regions of North and South America. It is a rock the composition and classification of which has been the cause of much discussion among geologists. See rhyncholite.

dacity (das'i-ti), n. A contraction of audacity.

I have plaid a major in my time with as good dacity as ere a hohly horse on 'em all.

Sampson, Vow Breaker

dacker, daker (dak'er, dä'ker), v. [F. dial. and Sc. (see usually spelled dacker), also decker, dooker; origin obscure; cf. OFlem. dackerren, move quickly, move to and fro, vibrate.] I. intrans. 1. To go about in a careless, aimless, or feeble manner; loiter; saunter.

2. To labor after the regular hours.—3. To traffic; truck.—4. To engage; grapple.

I dacker'd wi' him by myself.
Poems in the Buchan Dialect, p. 7.

5. To search, as for stolen or smuggled goods.

The Nevelians will but doubt he here,
To dacker for her as for robbed gear.
A. Ross, Helenore, p. 91

II. trans. To search; examine; search for (stolen or smuggled goods): as, to dacker a house.

dacker, daker (dak'er, dä'ker), n. [< dacker, daker, v.] A dispute; a struggle.

Dacne (dak'nä), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. δάκναι, bite, sting.] 1. A genus of clavicorn beetles. In its original application it was nearly the same as the modern family Cryptophagidae; in a restricted sense it includes those Cryptophagidae which have the antennae ending in a large orbicular or ovoid and compressed mass.

2. A genus of tetramerous beetles, of the family Erotylidae: same as Engis.

Dacnidae (dak-nid'-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Dacnis (-nid-), 1, + -idae.] A family of birds, typified by the genus Dacnis: synonymous with Corvidae. Cabanis, 1850.

Dacninae (dak-ni-di-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Dacnis (-nid-), 1, + -inae.] A subfamily of Corvidae, typified by the genus Dacnis, containing pitpits with a straight and acute bill and mandibles of equal length. It contains the genera Dacnis, Certhidea, Hemidacnis, Xenodacnis, Conirostrum, and Oreomacnis.

daemidinae (dak-ni-din), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dacninae.

Laughing Kingfisher (Dacelo gigas).

family Iacoroninae. D. gigas is the large Australian species known as the laughing-jackass.

Dacelonina (dä-sel'o-ni-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Dacelo (n.) + -inae.] One of the two subfamilies of Alcedinidae, having the bill more or less depressed, with smooth, rounded, or sulcate culmen; in the insectivorous, as distinguished from the piscivorous, kingfishers. There are about 14 genera and upward of 80 species, which feed for the most part upon insects, reptiles, and land-mollusks, instead of fish. All are old-world birds; some are African and Asiatic, but most inhabit the Australian, Papuan, and Oceanic regions. Leading genera are Dacelo, Alcedo, Tangara, and Ceryle.

dacey (dä'si), n. The usual name in Bengal, and in sericultural works, of a race of silkworms of which there are eight annual generations.

The silkworm yielding eight crops is found in Bengal, and is there called dacey.

dachshund (G. pron. daks'hönt), n. [G., < dachs, badger, & hund = E. hound.] The German badger-dog; a breed of short-legged, long-bodied dogs used to draw or bait badgers.

Dacian (dä'sian), a. and n. [L. Dacia, the province so called, < Daci = Gr. Δάκται. The L. adj. was Dacus or Dacicus, rarely Dacius.] 1. a. Pertaining or belonging to the Daci, an ancient barbarian people, or to their country, Dacia, made a Roman province after their conquest by Trajan (A. D. 104), comprising part of Hungary, Transylvania, nearly all of Rumania, and some adjacent districts.

There were his young barbarians all at play,
There was their Dacian mother, he, their sire,
Butchered to make a Roman holiday!
Byron, Child Harold, iv. 141.

II. n. One of the Daci; a native of Dacia.

In the time of Trajan were executed the reliefs which represent his victory over the Dacians.

C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 202.

dacite (dä'sit), n. [L. Dacia (see Dacian) + -ite.] A name first used by Fr. Von Hauer and Stache, in 1863, in describing the geology of Transylvania, to include the varieties of greenstone-trachyte which contain quartz. Dacite consists essentially of plagioclase and quartz, together with one or more minerals belonging to the biotite, hornblende, and pyroxene families. Dactis (dák'tis), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), in reg. < Gr. dáctis, bit, sting.] 1. A genus of birds conterminous in Cuvier's classification with the modern family Dacnoidae or Corobidae; the pipits or honey-creeper. It is now restricted to a section of that family having as typical species Certhia caryoceros and C. apus of Linnaeus, containing upward of 15 species, of which blue is the prevailing color, all inhabiting tropical continental America.

2. A genus of North American worm-eating warblers, of the family Mniotiltidae. Bonaparte, 1828.

dacotit, dacottage, etc. See dakotit, etc.

dacrot, n. See dicker.

dacryd (dák'rid), n. A tree of the genus Dacrydium.

Dacrydium (dák-rid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. dákrion (dim. of dákrus = E. tear), applied to a kind of seamy; in NL. use referring to the resinous drops exuded by the plants.] A genus of evergreen gymnospermous trees, belonging to the natural order Taxaceae. There are about 10 species, natives of the Malay archipelago, Tasmania, and New Zealand, some of which are valuable timber-trees, as D. Frankii, the Huon pine of Tasmania, and D. cupressinum, the rimu or red pine of New Zealand. D. taetianum of New Zealand is also a large tree.

dacrylogos (dák'ri-jé-ló'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. dákrus (> dákrion, weep), = E. tear, + lógos, laughter, < yláō, laugh.] In pathol., alternate laughing and weeping.

dacryo-adenitis (dák'ri-ó-ad-e-ní'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. dákrion, = E. tear, + ádēn, gland, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of a lacrymal gland.

dacryocystitis (dák'ri-ó-sis-tí'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. dákrion, = E. tear, + akris, vessel (cyst), + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the lacrymal sac.

dacryolite, dacryolith (dák'ri-ó-lít, -lith), n. [< Gr. dákrion, = E. tear, + lithos, a stone.] A lacrymal calculus; a concretion in the lacrymal canal or tear-duct.

dacryolithiasis (dák'ri-ó-lí-thi'a-sis), n. [NL., < dacryolith + -iasis.] In pathol., the morbid condition in which dacryoliths are produced.

dacryoma (dák-ri-ó-má), n. [NL., < Gr. dákrion, = E. tear, + -oma.] In pathol., the stoppage or obstruction in one or both of the puncta lacrymalia (tear-passages), by which the tears are prevented from passing into the nose, and in consequence run down over the lower eyelid.

dacryon (dák'ri-on), n. [NL., < Gr. dákrion, ppr. of dákrō = E. weep, < dákrion, dákrō, a tear (cf. dákrima = L. lacrima, lacryma, a tear), = E. tear, q. v.] The point where the frontal, lacrymal, and superior maxillary bones of the human skull meet. See craniometry.

dacryops (dák'ri-ops), n. [NL., < Gr. dákrion, = E. tear, + ops, eye, face.] In pathol.: (a) A cystiform dilatation of one of the ducts of the lacrymal gland. (b) A watery eye.

dactyl, dactyle (dák'til), n. [< L. dactylus, < Gr. dáktulos, a finger, a dactyl, a date (whence ult. E. date, q. v.), akin to L. digitus, a finger (see digit), and E. toe, q. v. The dactyl appears to have been so called because, like a finger, it consists of one long and two short members.]

1. A unit of linear measure; a finger-breadth; a digit: used in reference to Greek, Egyptian, and Babylonian measures. The Egyptian dactyl was precisely one fourth of a palm, and was equal to 0.74 inch, or 18.7 millimeters. The Babylonian and Assyrian dactyls are by some authors considered as the fifth part, by others as the sixth part, of the corresponding palm. The ordinary Greek dactyl was one fourth of a palm, and its value in Athens is variously calculated to be from 1.85 to 1.93 centimeters.

2. In pros., a foot of three syllables, the first long, the second and third short. The dactyl of modern or accentual versification is simply an accented syllable followed by two which are unaccented, and is accounted a dactyl without regard to the relative time taken in pronouncing the several syllables. Thus, the words cheerily, worldly, violet, and calify, which on the principles of ancient metrics could be called respectively a dactyl (— — —), a tribach (— — —), a Cretic (— — —), and an anapest (— — —), are all alike regarded as dactyls. The quantitative dactyl of Greek and Latin poetry is tetrasyllabic—that is, has a magnitude of four morae (see metre); and as two of those constitute the thesis (in the Greek sense) and two the arsis, the dactyl, like its inverse, the anapest (— — —), belongs to the equal (isochronous) class of feet. The true or normal dactyl has the ictus or musical stress on the first syllable (— — —). Its most frequent equivalent or substitute is the dactylic spondee (— — —), in which the two short times are contracted into one long. Resolution of the long syllable (— — —) is rare.

If ye use too many dactyls together ye make your music too light and of no solemn gravity, such as the amorous Elegies in court naturally require.

Puttenham, Art of Eng. Poess., p. 108.

From long to long in solemn sort Slow spondee stalks; strong foot yet ill able Ever to come up with Dactyl tri-syllable.

Coleridge, Medical Foot.

3. In anat.: (a) A digit, whether of the hand or foot; a finger or a toe. (b) A toe or digit of the hind foot only, when the word digit is restricted to a finger.—4. In soil., a dactylus.—5. The piddock, Pholas dactylus. See dactylus (c).—6. Mollis dactyla, a series of cyclic dactyls with a trochee in the first place. See lopatia.—Anapestic dactyl, a dactyl substituted for an anapest, and consequently taking the ictus on its second syllable (— — — for — — —).—Cyclic dactyl. See cyclic, 2.

dactyl (dák'til), v. i. [< dactyl, n.; in allusion to the rapid movement of dactylic verses.] To move nimbly; leap; bound. B. Jonson.

dactylar (dák'til-ár), a. [< dactyl + -ar.] Pertaining to a dactyl; dactylic.

dactyle, n. See dactyl.

dactyleti (dák'til-et), n. [< dactyl + dim. -eti.] A little or false dactyl.

How handsomely besets Dull spondee with the English dactyleti!
By. Hall, Histories, I. vi 14

Dactylethra (dák-til-é-thrá), n. [NL., < Gr. dáktylethra (also dáktylethron), a finger-sheath, a thumb-screw, < dáktulos, a finger: see dactyl, n.] A genus of tailless amphibians, constituting the family Dactylethridae. D. capensis inhabits South Africa.

Dactylethridae (dák-til-é-thríd-é), n. pl. [NL., < Dactylethra + -idae.] A family of aglossal, anurous, salient amphibians, represented by the single genus Dactylethra. It contains African frogs without a tongue, with a concealed tympanic membrane, maxillary and premaxillary teeth, webbed hind feet, and claws on the three inner toes, from which latter character the name of the genus is derived. The sacral diapophyses are dilated, and the coracoids and precoracoids are subequal, strongly divergent, and connected by a broad, double, not overlapping cartilage. Also called Xenopodidae.

Dactyli (dák'til-i), n. pl. [L., < Gr. dáktulos (dáctus, of ida, in Crete): see def. Cf. dactyl, n.] In classical antiqu., a class of mythical beings, guardians of the infant Zeus, inhabiting Mount Ida in Phrygia or in Crete, to whom the discovery of iron and the art of working it were ascribed. They were servants or priests of Cybele, and are sometimes confounded with the Curetes, the Corymbes, and the Corymbantes. The traditions about them and their place of abode vary.

dactyli, n. pl. Plural of dactylus.

dactylic (dák'til-ik), a. and n. [< L. dactylicus, < Gr. dáktulos, < dáktulos, a dactyl: see dactyl.] 1. a. In pros., constituting or equivalent to a dactyl; pertaining to or characteristic of a dactyl or dactyls; consisting of dactyls: as, a dactylic foot; a dactylic spondee; dactylic rhythm or meter; dactylic verses. The dactylic rhythm in classical poetry was regarded as especially majestic and dignified, a continuous sequence of dactyls, however, produced a relatively lighter and more animated effect, an admixture of spondee giving a more or less heavy or retarded movement to the verse. The most frequent dactylic meter is the hexameter. Other dactylic meters were used in Greek lyric poetry, and in the drama, especially in the earlier period, or in passages expressing lamentation (monodies and oemias). 2. n. a. hexameter and clapac.

This at least was the power of the spondee and dactylic harmony.
Johnson, Rambler, No. 84.

Inspired by the dactylic beat of the horses' hoofs, I essayed to repeat the opening lines of Evangelina.
Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 108.

Dactylic class (of feet), dactylic foot. See dactylic, n. Dactylic flute, a flute characterized by unequal intervals.—Dactylic spondee. See dactyl, 2.

II. n. 1. A line consisting chiefly or wholly of dactyls.—2. pl. Meters which consist of a repetition of dactyls or of equivalent feet.

Dactylobranchia, Dactylobranchiata (dák-til-i-ó-brang'ki-á, -brang'ki-á-tá), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dáktulos, a finger-ring, + bráchiya, gills.] An order of tunicates with a branchial sac of two gills girt anteriorly by a membranous ring and open posteriorly. It is represented by the Pyrosomatidae, or fire-bodies. Also, erroneously, Dactylobranchia.

dactyloglyph (dák-til-i-ó-glif), n. [< Gr. dáktulos (glif, an engraver of gems, < dáktulos, a finger-ring (< dáktulos, finger: see dactyl), + glifō, cut, engrave.] An engraver of finger-rings, or of fine stones such as those used for rings. Also dactyloglyphist.

dactyloglyphic (dák-til-i-ó-glif'ik), a. [< dactyloglyphy + -ic.] Having relation to or of the nature of dactyloglyphy. Also dactyloglyphic.

dactyloglyphist (dák-til-i-ó-glif'ist), n. [< dactyloglyphy + -ist.] Same as dactyloglyph.

dactyloglyphy (dák-til-i-ó-glif'í), n. [< Gr. dáktulos, < dáktulos, a finger-ring: see dactyl.] The art of engraving rings, and hence of engraving fine stones like those used for finger-rings. See dactyloglyph.

dactyloglyphic (dák-til-i-ó-glif'ik), a. [< Gr. dáktulos, a finger-ring, + glifō, verbal adj. of glifō, cut, carve, + -ic.] Same as dactyloglyphic.

dactylographer (dák-til-i-ó-grá-fér), n. [< Gr. dáktulos, a finger-ring, + gráphō, write, + -er.] One who studies or describes finger-rings; hence, by extension, one who describes engraved stones.

dactylographic (dák-til-i-ó-grá-f'ik), a. [< dactylography + -ic.] Relating to or of the nature of dactylography.

dactylography (dák-til-i-ó-grá-f'í), n. [< Gr. dáktulos, a finger-ring, + gráphō, < gráphō, write.] The science or study of finger-rings; a description of or an essay upon finger-rings, or, by extension, upon engraved gems.

dactyliology (dák-til-i-ó-ló-jí), n. [< Gr. dáktulos, a finger-ring, + lógos, < lógos, speak: see -ology.] Same as dactylography.

dactyliomancy (dák-til-i-ó-man-sí), n. [< Gr. dáktulos, a finger-ring, + mantría, divination.] Divination by means of a finger-ring. There are many modes, some in use in parts of Europe to this day: in all either a magic ring is used, or an ordinary finger-ring, in which some part of the spirit of the wearer is supposed to linger, and the movements of which are supposed to indicate his feelings or future actions.

The classical dactyliomancy, of which so curious an account is given in the trial of the conspirators Patricius and Hilarus, who worked it to find out who was to supplant the emperor Valens. A round table was marked at the edge with the letters of the alphabet, and with prayers and mystic ceremonies a ring was held suspended over it by a thread, and by swinging or stopping towards certain letters gave the responsive words of the oracle.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, I. 118.

dactylon (dák-til-i-on), n. [NL., < Gr. dáktulos, neut. of dáktulos, prop. adj. (n., a finger-ring), < dáktulos, finger: see dactyl.] 1. In surg., cohesion between two fingers, either congenital or as a consequence of burning, ulceration, etc.—2. A chiroplast or finger-gymnasium invented in 1835 by Henri Herz, for the use of pianoforte-players.

dactyliotheca (dák-til-i-ó-thé-ká), n.; pl. dactyliothecae (-é). [NL., < Gr. dáktulos, a collection of gems, < dáktulos, a finger-ring, + thēka, case, repository.] A collection of finger-rings, kept for their interest or rarity, or of engraved gems similar to those of rings, especially of Greek and Roman origin.

Dactylis (dák'til-is), n. [NL., < L. dactylis (also dactylus), a sort of grape (cf. dactylus, a sort of grass), < Gr. dáktulos, a sort of grape (cf. dáktulos, a kind of plant), < dáktulos, finger: see dactyl.] A genus of grasses, of about a dozen species, growing in the cooler temperate regions of the old world. D. glomerata is a valuable meadow grass of Europe and the United States, known as orchard-grass from its growing well in the shade, and as cockfoot-grass from the one-sided arrangement of its dense spikelets. It is a tall and rather stout perennial, with a tendency to form tussocks, yielding excellent hay, and making fine pastures when grown with other grasses.

dactylist (dák'til-ist), n. [< dactyl + -ist.] One who writes dactylic verse.

May is certainly a sonorous dactylist
T. Norton, Pref. to Milton's Smaller Poems.

dactylitis (dák-til-í'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. dáktulos, finger, toe, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of a finger or toe.

dactylodochme (dák'til-i-ó-dók'mé), n. [Gr. dáktulos, finger, four fingers' breadth, < dáktulos, finger, + dóchos, hand-breadth.] An Athenian measure of length: same as palarste.

Dactylognathia (dák-til-log'ná-thí), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dáktulos, finger, + gnáthos, jaw.] A group of arachnidans.

dactyloid (dák'til-i-oid), a. [< Gr. dáktuloidēs, like a finger, < dáktulos, finger, + eidōs, form.] In bot., finger-like in form or arrangement. Also dactyloer.

dactylogy (dák-til-i-ó-jí), n. [< Gr. dáktulos, finger, + lógos, < lógos, speak: see -ology.] The art of communicating ideas or converting by the fingers; the language of the deaf and dumb. See deaf-mute.

Dactyloctenium aegyptium

Dactylometra (dak'ti-lō-met'rā), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, a finger, + metron, a measure.] A genus of jollyfishes, of the family Pelagiidae and order Dyscoptera, related to Pelagia, but with more numerous tentacles. See out on preceding page.

Dactylomys (dak-til'ō-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, + mys, mouse.] A genus of hystricomorphic rodents, of the family Acto-

Hedgehog rat (Dactylomys tylops)

dontidae and subfamily Echimyinae, peculiar to South America. D. tylops, the leading species has a long scaly tail and lacks the spines in the pelage which most of this group of hedgehog rats possess.

dactylonomy (dak-ti-lōn'ō-mi), n. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + nomia, < nomos, rule; cf. vōmos, law: see nomē.] The art of counting or numbering on the fingers.

dactylopodite (dak-ti-lōp'ō-dīt), n. [Gr. dactylōs, a finger or toe, + podē (pod-), = E. foot, + -ite.] In crustaceans, the seventh and last (distal) segment of a limb; a dactylus. It is the last segment of a developed endopodite, succeeding the propodite, forming in a chelate limb, as of the lobster, with a process of the propodite, the nippers or pincers of the claw. See out under endopodite.

Dactylopora (dak-ti-lōp'ō-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, + poros, passage.] The typical genus of the family Dactyloporidae.

dactylopore (dak'ti-lō-pōr), n. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + poros, passage, pore.] In zoöl.: (a) The pore or opening of a dactylozoid in the hydrocoralline hydrozoans, as millepore coral. Moseley, 1881. (b) A foraminifer of the family Dactyloporidae.

dactyloporic (dak'ti-lō-pōr'ik), a. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + poros, passage.] Of or pertaining to a dactyloporic.

Dactyloporidae (dak'ti-lō-pōr'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dactylopora + -idae.] A family of imperforate milioline foraminifera.

Dactylopteridae (dak'ti-lōp'ter'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dactylopterus + -idae.] A family of mail-cheeked fishes, typified by the genus Dactylopterus. They have a distinct short spinous dorsal and a short soft dorsal and anal, and the pectorals are divided into a small upper and very long lower portion, and are expandible in a horizontal direction. The species are capable of long flying leaps from the water. Cephaloscyllium is a synonym.

dactylopteroid (dak-ti-lōp'te-roid), a. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + pteron, wing, + -oid.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dactylopteridae.

dactylopterous (dak-ti-lōp'te-rus), a. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + pteron, wing, + -ous.] In zool., having several inferior rays of the pectoral fin free, in part or entirely; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the genus Dactylopterus.

Dactylopterus (dak-ti-lōp'te-rus), n. [NL.: see dactylopterous.] A genus of acanthopterygian fishes, typical of the family Dactylopteridae.

Flying Gurnard (Dactylopterus volitans)

having the pectoral fins enormously enlarged and wing-like, and divided into two portions. D. volitans is the flying gurnard, also called flying fish, a name shared by the members of another family, Xenodermidae. Cephaloscyllium is a synonym.

dactylorhiza (dak'ti-lō-rī-zā), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, + rhiza, root.] Finger-and-toe, a disease of the roots of turnips, causing them to divide and become hard and useless. It is believed to be due to the nature of the soil, and is distinct from anbury, which is caused by the attacks of insects.

Dactyloscopidae (dak'ti-lōs-kop'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dactyloscopus + -idae.] A family of fishes, represented by the genus Dactyloscopus. They have an elongated sauriform body, suboid or sub-ovoid head, fringed opercles, very wide branchial apertures, a long single dorsal with its anterior portion spinous, and approximated ventrals with a spine and 3 rays each. The species are of small size, and inhabitants of the warm American seas.

Dactyloscopus (dak-ti-lōs'kō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, + skopos, view; cf. trascopos.] A genus of fishes, typical of the family Dactyloscopidae, and distinguished by finger-like or inarticulate ventral rays.

dactylothea (dak'ti-lō-thē'kā), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, + thēa, a case: see theca.] In ornith., the integument of the toes of a bird; the horny, leathery, or feathered covering of the toes. [Little used.]

dactylous (dak'ti-lus), a. [As dactyloose.] In zool., and anat., of or pertaining to a dactyl.

dactylozoid (dak'ti-lō-zō'id), n. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + zōon, < zōon.] In zool., an occasional elongated appendage of hydrozoans, devoid of a mouth and gastric cavity, and having a simple tentacular function: so called from its shape.

Besides the constant nutritive polyps and medusoid gonophores, there are in constant modified polypoids or medusoids. These are the mouthless worm-like dactylozooids which are provided with a tentacle, which has no lateral branches or aggregations of nematocytes. Claus, Zoology (trans.), I, 246

dactylus (dak'ti-lus), n. pl. dactyli (-li). [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, toe: see dactyl.] 1. In zool.: (a) In tristernia, the last segment of the normally 7-jointed leg; a dactylopodite. It is the movable claw of the two that make the nipper or chelate claw. (b) In entom., one or all of the tarsal joints which follow the first one in any insect, when, as in a bee, for example, the first joint is much larger than the rest and known as the metatarsus or planta. In bees this first joint is different in structure as well as size from the rest, and is specifically called the propodea. When the large first joint is called the planta, the dactylus is known as digitus, as in Kirby and Spence's nomenclature. The use of dactylus in this sense is by Burnmeister and his followers. (c) In conch., a piddock, Pholas dactylus.

It is the property of the dactylus (a fish so called from its strong resemblance to the human nail) to shine brightly in the dark. Pliny, Nat. Hist. (trans.), ix, 87.

2. In anat. See digitus, 1.

Dacus (dä'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. dakos, an animal of which the bite is dangerous, < daknō, bite.] A genus of dipterous insects, of the family Muscidae, or flies. D. oleæ is a species injurious to the olive.

Daguerre of Paris, first published in 1839, by which the lights and shadows of a landscape or a figure are fixed on a prepared metallic plate by the action of actinic light-rays. A plate of copper thinly coated with silver is subjected in a close box in a dark room to the action of the vapor of iodine and when it has assumed a yellow color it is placed in the chamber of a camera obscura and an image of the object to be reproduced is projected upon it by means of a lens. The plate is then withdrawn and exposed to vapor of mercury to bring out the impression distinctly, after which it is plunged into a solution of sodium hyposulphite, and lastly washed in distilled water. See photography daimio (dā'myō), n. [Chino-Jap., < dai, great, + mio, name.] The title of the chief feudal barons or territorial nobles of Japan, vassals of the mikado: distinguished from the shōmō ('little name'), the title given to the hatamoto, or vassals of the shōgun. See shōgun. Though exercising independent authority in their own domains, the daimio acknowledged the mikado as the legitimate ruler of the whole country. During the Tokugawa shōgunate (1603-1868) the daimios gradually became subject to the shōguns, who compelled them to live in Edo, with their families and a certain number of their retainers, for six months of every year, and on their departure for their own provinces to leave their families as hostages. The number of daimio differed at different times, according to the fortunes of war and the caprice of the shōgun. Just before the abolition of the shōgunate there were 265, arranged in five classes, with incomes ranging from 10,000 to 1,027,000 koku of rice per annum. In 1871 the daimios surrendered their lands and privileges to the mikado, who granted pensions proportioned to their respective revenues, and relieved them of the support of the samurai, their military retainers. These pensions have since been commuted into active bonds, redeemable by government within thirty years from date of issue. The title has been abolished, and that of kwanzyō bestowed upon court and territorial nobles alike. See kwanzyō.

Milton, P. L., IV, 234.

damasked (dam'-akt), p. a. [Pp. of damask, v.] 1. Having a running figure covering the surface, as in damask or damasked metal.

This place [Damascus] is likewise famous for cutlery ware, which . . . is made of the old iron that is found in ancient buildings: . . . the blades made of it appear damasked or watered.

Poivre, Description of the East, II, I, 125.

Brant of Paris, employed cast steel and carburetted steel, and he got a damasked blade after acidulated washing. N. and Q., 6th ser., XI, 352.

2. In her., decorated with an ornamental pattern, as the field or an ordinary. [Rare.]

damascene (dam'-a-sen), v. t. [Early mod. E. also damaskin; = MD. damasceneren, < F. damasquiner, damask, flourish, carve, engrave or otherwise ornament damaskwise, < damasquin, of damask (= Sp. Pg. damasquino = It. damascino, dammaschino, of damask, formerly also as a noun, damask, damask-work), < damas (= It. damasco, etc., < ML. damascus), damask. Damascen (not used as an adj. in E.) thus ult. represents F. damasquin, formed anew as an adj. from damas (in E. as if < damask + -in) and meaning 'relating to damask.' It has been confused in part with damascene, which is of much older origin and means 'relating to Damascus.' To ornament (metal, as steel), by inlaying or otherwise, in such a way as to produce an effect compared (originally) with that of damask: ornament with flowers or patterns on the surface; damask.

Copies of fine Corinthian latten, gilded and damasked.
Purkes, Pilgrimage, p. 207.

damascening (dam'-a-sen-ing), v. [Verbal n. of damascene, v.] 1. The art of ornamenting a surface of one metal by inlaying with another. A surface of iron, steel, or bronze is first engraved with lines and figures, the incisions being more or less undercut—that is, broader at the bottom than at the surface. The metal used for the ornamental pattern is then usually inlaid in the form of a narrow ribbon or strip, which is driven into its place by blows of a mallet, the whole surface is then polished. Also called damascene work.

2. An effect produced by repeatedly welding, drawing out, and doubling up a bar composed of a mixture of iron and steel, the surface of which is afterward treated with an acid. The surface of the iron under this treatment retains its metallic luster, while that of the steel is left with a black, firmly adhesive coating of carbon. Howe and Scherlemmer. Also damask, damasking.

damaskint, v. t. An obsolete form of damascen.

damaskint, n. [Var. of damascen, after damaskin, v.] A Damascus blade; a damasked blade.

No old Toledo blades or damaskins.
Howell, Poem to Charles I., Jan., 1641.

damasking (dam'-a-sen-ing), n. [Verbal n. of damask, v.] 1. Same as damascening.—2. Adornment with figures.

An opinion that no clothing so adorned them as their painting and damasking of their bodies.
Spenser, Ancient Britains, V, vii, 7.

3. Wavy lines formed on metal by damascening, or lines similar in appearance.

But above all conspicuous for these works and damaskings is the maple.
Evelyn, To Dr. Wilkins.

3. A woman of rank, high social position, or culture; a lady; specifically, in Great Britain, the legal title of the wife or widow of a knight or baronet.

Not all these lords do vex me half so much
As that proud dame, the lord protector's wife.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., I, 3.

4. A woman in general: particularly, a woman of mature years, a married woman, or the mistress of a household: formerly often used (like the modern Mrs.) as a title, before either the surname or the Christian name.

Where shall we find leash or band,
For dame that loves to rove?

Scott, Marmion, l. 17.

One old dame

Came suddenly on the Queen with the sharp news.
Truncheon, Lancet and Elaine.

5. The mistress of an elementary school.

He bewailed his sinful course of life, his disobedience to his parents, his slighting and despising their instructions and the instructions of his dame, and other means of grace God had offered him.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II 60.

Like many others born in villages, he [Robert Hall] received his first regular instruction at a dame's school that of Dame Scotland.

Gregory.

6. In Eton, England, a woman with whom the boys board, and who has a certain care over them; sometimes, also, a man who occupies the same position.

Eton is less symmetrical than the other two, in so far as she retains Dame's houses, cheaper than tutors' houses. About one hundred and thirty boys board with Dames.
Sydney Smith, in C. A. Bristed's English University, p. 338.

Dame Joan ground. See ground.

dammar (dam'gr), n. [Also damar; < Hind. dāmar, resin, pitch: see dammar-resin.] Same as dammar-resin.

Dammara (dam'ā-rā), n. [NL., also Damara; < dammar, q. v.] 1. A genus of large discous coniferous trees to which the earlier name Agathis has been restored. They are natives of the East Indian islands, New Guinea, and New Zealand, have large lanceolate leathery leaves, and bear ovate or globose cones with a single laterally winged seed under each scale. There are 8 or 10 species. D. orientalis is a tall tree, attaining on the mountains of Ambon a height of from 80 to 100 feet. Its light timber is of little value, but it yields the well-known dammar-resin. Another species is D. australis, the kauri-pine of New Zealand, which is sometimes 300 feet high, and affords a very strong and durable wood, highly esteemed for masts and the planking of vessels and for house-building, and often richly mottled. It yields a large quantity of resin, which is also found buried in large masses on sites where the tree no longer grows. (Other useful species are D. obtusa of the New Hebrides, D. Morris of New Caledonia, etc.)

2. [l. c.] Same as dammar-resin.

dammaroit, n. [Appar. a var. of dameret; < OF. dameret, a lady's man, a carpet-knight, < dame, lady: see dame.] An effeminate person; a lady's man.

dammar-resin (dam'gr-res-in), n. A gum or resin resembling copal, produced by various resinous Dammara. From Indian or cat's-eye species.

resin is obtained from D. orientalis, and when mixed with powdered bamboo-bark and a little chalk is used for calking ships. Another variety, the kauri-gum, is obtained from D. australis of New Zealand; it is colorless or pale-yellow, hard and brittle, and has a faint odor and resinous taste. Both gums are used for colorless varnish, for which purpose they are dissolved in turpentine. Also dammar-resin, dammar-gum, dammar, dammarin, dammar, damar, dammer. — Black dammar-resin, of southern India, a product of Canarium strictum, of the natural order Burseraceae. — White dammar-resin, a product of Vateria indica, used in varnish on the Malabar coast in India. Also called Indian copal or pinu resin.

damme (dam'e), interj. A coalesced form of damn me, used as an oath.

Come, now; shall I begin with an oath? Do, Sir Lucius, let me begin with a damme. Shenando, The Rivals, II. 4.

dammer (dam'ēr), n. One who dams up water, or who builds dams.

dammer (dam'ēr), n. Same as dammar-resin.
damn (dam), v. [ME. dampnen, usually dampnen, < OF. dampner, dampner, dampner, dampner, often dampner, dampner, F. dampner = Pr. dampnar = OSP. dampnar, dānar = Pg. dampnar = It. dampnare, condemn, damn (cf. OHG. irtdamnon, MHG. verdamnen, G. verdammen, damn), < L. dāpnare, condemn, fine, < dāpnus, loss, harm, fine, penalty: see dague, and cf. condemn.] L. trans. 1. To condemn; affirm to be guilty, or worthy of punishment; sentence judicially.

He that doubteth is damned if he eat. Rom. xiv. 23.

Lifting the flood up to high Honours seat,
And the Evil damning evermore to dy.
Spenser, To G. Harvey.

In some part of the land these serving-men (for so be these damned persons called) do no common work; but as every private man needeth labours, so he cometh into the market-place, and there hitherth some of them for meat and drink.
Sir T. More, Utopia, tr. by Robinson, l.

2. To assign to a certain fate; doom.

Dampnyd was to dye in that prison.
Chaucer, Monk's Tale, l. 425.

And there is dampnyd to dwell.
Gauequign, Philomene (ed. Arbet), p. 110.

Specifically—3. In theol., to doom to punishment in a future state; condemn to hell. [For this word, as used in this sense in the authorized version of the Bible, the word condemn has been substituted in the revised version. See damnation.]

He that believeth not shall be damned. Mark xvi. 16.

That which he continues ignorant of, having done the utmost lying in his power that he might not be ignorant of it, shall not damn him. South, Sermons.

Hence—4. In the imperative, used profanely in emphatic obijuration or contempt of the object, and more vulgarly in certain arbitrary phrases (as damn your or his eyes!) in general reprehension or defiance of a person.

Ay, ay, it is all very true; but, hark ee, Rowley, while I have, by heaven I'll give; so damn your economy.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 1.

5. To address with the obijuration "damn!"; swear at.

He scarcely spoke to me during the whole of the brief drive, only opening his lips at intervals to damn his horse.
Charlotte Brontë, The Professor, II.

6. To adjudge or pronounce to be bad; condemn as a failure; hence, to ruin by expressed disapproval; as, to damn a play. [Chiefly in literary use.]

For the great dons of wit,
Phobus gives them full privilege alone
To damn all others, and cry up their own.
Dryden, Indian Emperor.

Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And without sneering teach the rest to swear.
Pope, Prol. to Satires, l. 201.

To damn a bond or a deed, to cancel it.

II. intrans. To use the obijuration "damn!"; swear.

damn (dam), n. The verb damn used as a profane word; a curse; an oath.

Ay, ay, the best terms will grow obsolete. Damn have had their day.
Sheridan, The Rivals, II. 1.

Not to care a damn, to be totally indifferent. [Slang. Cf. curse.] — Tinker's damn, trooper's damn, something absolutely worthless. [Slang. Cf. curse.]

damna, n. Plural of damnum.

damnability (dam-na-blī'ti), n. [ML. damnabilitas (-s), < L. damnabilis: see damnabile.] The state or quality of deserving damnation; damnableness.

The deadlyness, or, as men might say, . . . the damnability belonging to the mortal offence.
Sir T. More, Works, p. 483.

damnable (dam'na-bl), a. [ME. dampnable, < OF. dampnable, F. dampnable = Pr. dampnable = OSP. dampnable, dānabile = It. dampnabile, < L. dāpnare, condemn: see damn.] 1. To be condemned; worthy of condemnation; productive of harm, loss, or injury.

And yet this way be foul, it is damnable,

And neither pleasant, neither profitable.
Pelladius, Husbondrie (M. A. T. S.), p. 6.

2. Worthy of damnation.

O thou damnable fellow! did not I pluck thee by the nose for thy speeches? Shak., M. for M., v. 1.

A creature unprepared, unmeet for death;
And to transport him in the mind he lies
Were damnable. Shak., M. for M., iv. 2.

Doctrines which once were damnable are now fashionable, and heresies are appropriated as aids to faith.
G. H. Lewes, Froth of Life and Mind, I. l. § 1.

3. Entailing damnation; damning.

The mercy of God, if it be rightly applied, there is nothing more comfortable; if it be abused, as an occasion to the flesh, there is nothing more damnable.

Hieron, Works (ed. 1684), I. 185.

4. Odious; detestable; abominable; outrageous. [Regarded as profane.]

Now shall we have damnable ballads out against us,
Most wicked madrigals.
Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, II. 2.

They do cursedly and damnably as yet. Crist.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

2. Odiously; detestably; abominably. [Regarded as profane.]

I'll let thee plainly know, I am cheated damnably.
Fletcher, Rule a Wife, v. 2.

damnation (dam-nā'shon), n. [ME. dampnation, < OF. dampnation, dampnation, dampnation, etc., F. dampnation = Pr. dampnatio = OSP. dampnacion, dāpnacion = Pg. dampnacio = It. dannazione, < L. dāpnatio (-n), condemnation, < dāpnare, pp. dāpnatus, condemn, damn: see damn, and cf. condemnation.] 1. Condemnation; adverse judgment; judicial sentence; doom.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayer: therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation.
Mat. xxiii. 14.

And shall come forth: they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation. John v. 29.

In the commonly misunderstood sense in the 'Com-munion Office, taken from 1 Cor. x. 20, eat and drink our own damnation, the latter word is used in its simple sense of judgment. Bible Word Book.

[This is the sense in which the word is used in the authorized version of the New Testament: in the revised version, in some passages condemnation (Mat. xxiii. 14; Mark xli. 40), in others judgment (Mat. xxiii. 33; John v. 29; 1 Cor. x. 20), is substituted for it.]

Specifically—2. In theol., condemnation to punishment in the future state; sentence to eternal punishment.

He that hath been afflicted with the fears of hell, or remembers how often he hath been spared from an horrible damnation, will not be ready to strangle his brother for a trifle.
Jer. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

3. Something meriting eternal punishment.

Besides, this Duncan Hath borne his faculties so meek, hath been So clear in his great office, that his virtues Will plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against The deep damnation of his taking-off.
Shak., Macbeth, I. 7.

4. The act of censuring or condemning by open disapproval, as by hissing or other expression of disapprobation.

Don't lay the damnation of your play to my account.
Fielcing, Joseph Andrews.

5. Used as a profane expletive. [Low.]

damnatory (dam'nā-tō-rī), a. [*ML. *damnatorius*, < L. dāpnatus, pp. of dāpnare, damn: see damn.] Containing a sentence of condemnation; assigning to damnation; condemnatory; damning; as, the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian creed.

Boniface was in the power of a prince who made light of his damnatory invectives. Hallam, Middle Ages, vii. 2.

damned (damd), p. a. [Pp. of damn, v.] 1. Condemned; judicially sentenced; specifically, (reputed to be) sentenced to punishment in a future state; consigned to perdition.

But although all damned persons at the great day will be confounded and ashamed, yet some will be more ridiculously miserable than such who go to Hell for fashion's sake.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. xii.

2. Hatful; detestable; abominable; a profane obijuration, also used adverbially to express more or less intense dislike: as an adverb also simply intensive, equivalent to 'very,' 'exceedingly,' employed to strengthen an adjective used in either reprobation or approbation, and in sound often shortened to dam. In literary use often printed d—d.

What a damned Epicurean race is this!

Shak., M. W. of W., II. 2.

damnable (dam-ni'f'ik), a. [= OF. damnable, < L. damnosus, harm, loss, damage, + facere, do, make. Cf. damnify.] Procuring or causing loss or injury; mischievous. damnable (dam-ni'f'ik-bl), a. [cf. damnify (cf. damnable) + -able.] Same as damnable.

God and nature gave men and beasts these natural instincts or inclinations to provide for themselves all those things that are profitable and to avoid all those things which are damnable.

T. Wright, Passions of the Mind, II. 5.

damnification (dam-ni-si-f'i-k'ashun), n. [cf. damnify: see -fy and -ation.] Damage inflicted; that which causes damage or loss.

damnify (dam-ni-fi), v. t.: pret. and pp. damned, ppr. damning. [cf. OF. damnifier, damnifier = L. damnosus, < L. damnosus, injury, harm, < L. damnosus, doing injury: see damns.] To cause loss or damage to; hurt in person, estate, or interest; injure; endamage; impair. [Now rare except in legal use.]

This little hath been very much damned at two several times; first by Attila, . . . who destroyed it; secondly by Goliath.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 130.

If such an one be not our neighbor, then we have no relation to him by any command of the second table, for that requires us to love our neighbor only, and then we may deceive, beat, and otherwise damny him, and not sin.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 136.

They acknowledge the power of the Englishman's God . . . because they could never yet have power . . . to damny the English either in body or goods.

Boyle, Works, III. 330.

damp (damp), n. [cf. ME. damp (inferred from the verb) = D. damp = M.G. LG. damp, vapor, smoke, steam, = M.H.G. dampf; dampf, vapor, smoke, G. dampf, vapor, steam, = Dan. damp, vapor, = Sw. dial. damp-en, damp, Sw. damp (for damp), dust (Icel. dampur, dampur, steam, is mod. and borrowed); akin to Icel. dumba = Norw. dumba, mist, fog, = Sw. dumba, formerly dumba, mist, haze; also to G. dampf, damp, dull, (of sound) low, heavy, muffled, D. dampig, damp, heavy, misty; all from the verb repr. by M.H.G. dampfen (pret. dampf), reek, smoke, = Sw. dial. damba, reek, steam. Cf. Gr. ripen, smoke, ripen, smoke, vapor, ripen, a storm, Skt. dāpa, incense.] 1. Moist air; humidity; moisture.

It is evident that a damp being but a breath or vapour, and not to be discerned by the eye, ought not to have this epithet (darbo). Pusttenham, Arts of Eng. Poets, p. 214.

Night . . . with black air Accompanied; with damp and dreadful gloom.
Milton, P. L., x. 248.

2. A poisonous vapor; specifically, in mining, a stifling or poisonous gas. See black-damp, fire-damp.

Look not upon me, as ye love your honours!
I am so cold a coward, my infection
Will choke your virtues like a damp else.
Fletcher, Honduras, IV. 2.

3. A fog.

And, when a damp
Fell round the path of Milton, in his hand
The Thing became a trumpet; whence he blew Soul-animating strains—alas! too few.
Wordsworth, Misc. Sonnets, II. 1.

4. A check; a discouragement.

This made a damp in ye business, and caused some distraction.
Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 29.
To have owned any fixed scheme of religious principles, would have been a mighty damp to their [seamen's] imaginations.
Br. Atterbury, Bermuda, I. v.

5. Depression of spirits; dejection.

The disappointments which naturally attend the great promises we make ourselves in expected enjoyments strike no damp upon such men.
Steele, Tatler, No. 211.

The damp, dampness.

My Lady Yarmouth is forced to keep a constant fire in her room against the damp.
Walpole, Letters, II. 177.

damp (damp), a. [cf. damp, n.; cf. G. dampf, D. dampig, damp, under the noun.] 1. Moist; humid; moderately wet: as, a damp cloth; damp air.

Wide anarchy of Chaos damp and dark.
Milton, P. L., x. 268.

In some of the damp ravines tree-ferns flourished in an extraordinary manner. Darwin, Voyage of Beagle, II. 234.
The air is damp, and hush'd, and close. Tennyson, Song.

2. Clammy.

She said no more: the trembling Trojans hear,
'Tis spread with a damp sweat and holy fear.
Dryden, Æneid, vi. 85.

3. Dejected; depressed. [Rare.]

All these and more came flocking, but with looks Downcast and damp.
Milton, P. L., I. 522.

= syn. 1. Humid, Dank, etc. See moist.

damp (damp), v. [(a) In more lit. sense 'moisten' first in mod. E. (= D. dampen = G. dampfen = Dan. damppe, reek, smoke); from the noun. (b) < ME. dampen, extinguish (= D. dampen = M.H.G. dampfen, dampen = M.H.G. dampfen, G. dampfen = Dan. dæmpe = Sw. dämpa, extinguish, smother, deaden), a secondary verb, causal of the orig. verb whence the noun damp is derived: see damp, n. Cf. dampen.] 1. trans. 1. To moisten; make humid or moderately wet; dampen.

In vain the clouds combine to damp the sky,
If thou thy Face's sunshine dost display.
J. Besenrodt, Psyche, I. 180.

He died, the sword in his mailed hand,
On the holiest spot of the Blessed Land,
Where the cross was *damp*ed with his dying breath.
Hallack, Alwrick Castle.

2. To extinguish; smother; suffocate.

Al watz *damp*ed & don, & drowned by theme.
Altitratte Fornis (ed. Morris), II. 939.

3. To suffocate with damp or foul air in a mine. [Eng.]—4. To check or retard the force or action of: as, to damp a fire by covering it with ashes; especially, to diminish the range or amplitude of vibrations in, as a piano-string, by causing a resistance to the motions of the vibrating body. Both the vibrations and the vibrating body are said to be *damp*ed. Usually applied to acoustic vibrations, but also to slower oscillations.

5. To make dull or weak and indistinct, as a sound or a light; obscure; deaden.

Another Nymph with fatal Pow'r may rise,
To damp the sinking Beams of Celia's Eyes.
Prior, Celia to Damon.

6. To depress; deject; discourage; deaden; check; weaken.

Those of yours who are now full of courage and forwardness would be much *damp*ed, and so less able to undertake so great a burden.
Winthrop, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, [p. 254].

I do not mean to wake the gloomy form
Of superstition dressed in wisdom's garb
To damp your tender hopes.
Abrams.

Shall I own to you that my joy at hearing of your health and arrival here, by your neighbour Acres, was somewhat *damp*ed by his dwelling much on the high spirits you had enjoyed in Devonshire.
Sheridan, The Rivals, II. 2.

The want of confidence in the public councils *damp*s every useful undertaking, the success and profit of which may depend on a continuance of existing arrangements.

A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. 62.

Specifically—7. To diminish or destroy the oscillation of (a metallic body in motion in a magnetic field). When a conductor is moved in a magnetic field, or when a magnet is moved in the vicinity of a conductor, there will be, in general, an induced current generated which will oppose the motion to which it is due. The moving body will act as if immersed in a viscous liquid, and will more quickly come to rest. Advantage is taken of this fact in stilling the vibrations of a magnetic needle in a galvanometer or a compass by placing masses of conducting metal near the vibrating body. Damping is also accomplished by attaching to the needle a disk, cylinder, or vane, which swings in a liquid or in air.

[Dampen is now more common in the literal sense, and is sometimes used in the derived senses.]

= syn. 6. To moderate, allay, dissipate.

II. *intrans. In hort., to rot or waste away, as the stems and leaves of seedlings and other tender plants, when the soil and atmosphere in which they are vegetating are too wet or cold: with off: as, flower-seedlings in hotbeds are especially liable to damp off.

dampen (damp'en), v. [cf. damp + -en. Cf. damp.] 1. trans. 1. To make damp or humid; apply moisture to; wet slightly; damp: as, the grass was dampened by a slight shower; to dampen clothes for ironing.—2. To put a check or damper upon; make weak or dull; dim; deaden. See damp.

P. Fletcher, Purple Island, vii.

II. *intrans. To become damp.

dampener (damp'nér), n. One who or that which dampens; a damper.

The copper block acts as a dampener.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 290.

dampier (damp'pér), n. [cf. damp + -er; = D. dampier, etc.] 1. One who or that which dampens. (a) A mechanical device for checking action in something with which it is connected. (1) A metal plate pivoted at the center or sliding in guides in the flue of a stove, range, or furnace of any kind, and used to control combustion by regulating the draft. Some forms of dampers are designed to be controlled by automatic regulators, which are operated either by the heat of the fire directly (by contraction or expansion of a metal) or, when connected with a steam-boller, by the pressure of the steam. (2) In the pianoforte, a small piece of wood or wire thickly covered with felt, which rests upon the strings belonging to each key of the keyboard. When the key is struck the damper is drawn away from the strings, but the instant the key is released the damper returns and checks the vibrations of the strings. The dampers of all the keys can be raised by pressing the damper-pedal (which see), so that the vibration of the strings can be prolonged after the finger has left the key. (3) The mute of a brass instrument, as a horn. (4) An arrangement for arresting the vibrations of a magnetic needle. See damp, s. t., 7. (5) One who or that which depresses, dejects, discourages, or checks. [Colloq.]

Sussex is a great dampier of curiosity.

Walpole, Letters, II. 178.

This . . . was rather a dampier to my ardour in his behalf.

T. Hook, Gilbert Gurney, I. 1.

2. A kind of unfermented bread, made of flour and water, and generally baked on a stone. [Australian.]

The table upon which their meal of mutton and dampier is partaken is also formed of bark.

Colonial and Indian Exhibition (1886), p. 61.

dampier-pedal (damp'pér-ped'al), n. In the pianoforte, the pedal which raises all the dampers from the strings, so that the vibration of the strings can be prolonged after the finger has left the key, and so that other strings besides those struck may be drawn into sympathetic vibration. Sometimes called loud pedal.

damping (damp'ing), n. [Verbal n. of damp, v.] 1. In bleaching, a process by which a certain amount of moisture is added to a fabric after starching, to prepare it for finishing. Spon, Encyc. Manuf., p. 497.—2. The process or method of retarding or stopping the action of a vibrating or oscillating body, as a magnetic needle. See damp, r. t., 7.—Damping-roller, in lithog., a roller covered with felt and cotton cloth, used to dampen the stone in lithographic printing.

dampiness (damp'ish-ness), n. A moderate degree of dampness or moistness; slight humidity.

Robbins sometimes dances and cause bad winding, and consequently strain roving.
P. Wilson, Cotton Carder's Companion, p. 107.

3. To move the body or the feet rhythmically to music, either by one's self or with a partner or in a set; perform the series of cadenced steps and rhythmic movements which constitute a dance; engage or take part in a dance.

Pray, good shepherd, what fair swain is this Which dances with your daughter?
Shak., W. T., IV. 2.

Still unaccomplish'd may the Maid be thought,
Who gracefully to Dance was never taught.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

II. trans. 1. To give a dancing motion to; cause to move up and down with a jerky, irregular motion; dandle.

Thy grandaunt lov'd thee well;
Many a time he danc'd thee on his knee.
Shak., Tit. And., v. 3.

2. To perform or take part in as a dancer; execute, or take part in executing, the cadenced steps or regulated movements which constitute (some particular dance): as, to dance a quadrille or a hornpipe.

Is there no one among you
Will dance this dance for me?
Sweet Willie and Fair Mary (Child's Ballads, II. 336).

3. To lead or conduct with a tripping, dancing movement.

Let the torrent dance thee down
To find him in the valley.
Tennyson, Princess, vii.

To dance a heart, to exhibit a performing heart; hence, to play the showman.

What though I am obligated to dance a bear, a man may be a gentleman for all that.
Goldsmith, She Swoops to Conquer, l. 2.

To dance attendance, to wait with obsequiousness; strive to please and gain favor by assiduous attentions and officious civilities.

A man of his place, and so near our favour,
To dance attendance on their lordships' pleasures.
Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 2.

Hee will wait vpon your Staires a whole Afternoone, and dance attendance with more patience then a Gentleman Valier.
Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A. V. Universelle Danne.

dance (dāns), n. [Early mod. E. dancer; < ME. dāncer, dāncer (= D. dāns = MLG. lāi. dānz, dāns, lāi. dānz = Dan. dāns = Sw. dāns = Icel. dānz, mod. dāns; also, of earlier date, MHG. and G. tānz), < OF. dāncier, dāncier, F. dāncier = Pr. dānsa = Sp. dānsa = Pg. dānsa; from the verb.] 1. A succession of more or less regularly ordered steps and movements of the body, commonly guided by the rhythmic intervals of a musical accompaniment; any leaping or gliding movement with more or less regular steps and turnings, expressive of or designed to awaken some emotion. The dance is perhaps the earliest and most spontaneous mode of expressing emotion and dramatic feeling; it exists in a great variety of forms, and is among some people connected with religious belief and practice, as among the Mohammedans and Hindus. Modern dances include the jig, hornpipe, etc., step dances executed by one person: the waltz, polka, schottische, etc., danced by pairs, and usually called round dances, the reel, quadrille, etc., usually called square dances, danced by an even number of pairs; the country-dance, in which any number of pairs may take part; and the cotillon or German, consisting of many intricate figures, in the execution of which the waltz-movement predominates.

For thei fonde a meadow that was closed a-boute with wode, and fonde with ynn the feirest dance of the world of ladies, and of maydenes, and knyghtes, the feireste that ever hadde thei syn in hir lyve.
Merrie (E. E. T. A.), II. 361.

Meanwhile welcome joy and feast, . . .
Tipsey dancer and jollity. Alfieri, Comus, l. 104.

Tip with the dance! let joy be unconfin'd.
Byron, Child Harold, III. 22.

2. A tune by which dancing is regulated, as the minuet, the waltz, the cotillon, etc.—3. A dancing-party; a ball; a "hop."

It was not till the evening of the dance at Netherfield that I had any apprehension of his feeling a serious attachment. Jane Austen, Pride and Prejudice, p. 160.

A dinner and then a dance
For the maids and marriage-makers.
Tennyson, Maid, xx.

4. Figuratively, progressive or strenuous movement of any kind; a striving or struggling motion: often used by old writers in a sarcastic sense, especially in the phrases the new dances, the old dances.

He may gon in the dance
Of hem that Love list lebelly for to advance.
Chaucer, Troilus, l. 517.

Dance of death, in allegorical painting and sculpture, a subject illustrative of the universal power of death, in which a skeleton or a figure representing death is a prominent feature, very frequently met with in ancient buildings, stained glass, and decorations of manuscripts.—Dance upon nothing, a euphemism for being hanged.

Just as the felon, condemned to die,
From his gloomy cell in a vision elopes,
To caper on sunny greens and slopes,
Instead of the dance upon nothing.

Wood, Miss Kilmansegg.

St. Vitus's dance, chorea.—To lead one a dance, figuratively, to lead one hither and thither in a perplexing way and with final disappointment; delude, as with false hopes; put one to much trouble.

You know very well my passion for Mrs. Martha, and what a dance she has led me. Addison, Demurrors in Love.

To lead the dance, to take the lead.

In fools [many] myriads none maketh to fall,
Of all sorrows we who dance the dance lead.

dance-music (dāns'mū'sik), n. 1. Music rhythmically fitted and specially intended as an accompaniment for dancing.—2. Music rhythmically suitable for dancing, but not set to any particular kind of dance, as the mazurkas of Chopin.

dancer (dān'sēr), n. [Early mod. E. dancer, < ME. dancere (= D. danser = MHG. tancer, tencer, g. tancer = Dan. danser = Sw. dansare); < dance, r., + -er.] 1. One who dances, or takes part in a dance; specifically, one who practises dancing as a profession, as on the stage.

And after that their can dancers and some of them Disgraced in women clothes that dandied a great while.

dandy (dan'di), n. and a. [Perhaps a popular accommodation of F. dandin, a ninny, booby, connected with dandiner, look foolish, gape ill-favoredly (< Colgrave), mod. swing, away, jog: see dandle. Cf. dandiprat.] I. n.; pl. dandies (-diz). 1. A man who attracts attention by the unusual finery of his dress and a corresponding fastidiousness or display of manner; a man of excessive neatness and primness in his attire and action; an exquisite; a fop.

Your men of fashion, your "Muscadini" of Paris, and your dandies of London.

Thackeray.

The introduction of the modern slang word dandy as applied, half in admiration and half in derision, to a fop dates from 1814. After 1835 the meaning gradually changed; it ceased to mean a man ridiculous and contemptible by his ostentatious eccentricities, and came to be applied to those who were trim, neat, and careful in dressing according to the fashion of the day.

E. Selby, N. and Q., 6th ser., IX, 35

Skoboleff, although himself a dandy who went into action accented like a popinjay, did not believe in "fancy" soldiers for his subordinates.

daphnad (dāf' nad), n. One of the Thymeleaceae Lindley.

daphnal (dāf' nāl), a. [< Daphne + -al] In bot., of, pertaining to, or related to the daphnads: as, the daphnal alliance (the daphnads and the laurels). See Daphne.

Daphne (dāf' nē), n. [NL, < L. daphne, < Gr. dāphnē, the laurel, or rather the bay-tree (in myth, a nymph beloved of Apollo and metamorphosed into a laurel), also, later, dāphnē, dial. dāphnē, also dāphnē, dāphnē, prob. orig. **dāphnē* = (with var term) L. laurus, laurel: see Laurus, laurel.] 1. In bot., a genus of small erect or trailing shrubs of the natural order Thymeleaceae, including about 40 species of the temperate regions of Europe and Asia. Some of these are cultivated in gardens for their beauty or fragrance; others are of medicinal importance, and a few are employed in the manufacture of hemp and paper from the tough stringy bark. The most generally known species are the daphne crispata lauri D. Laureola with evergreen leaves and green axillary flowers, the meadow D. Mezereum with very fragrant flowers, the spurge D. Genkwa, and D. Genkwa, a trailing shrub with a profusion of bright red colored and exquisitely fragrant flowers. The bark and the fruit of the meadow and some other species have strongly acrid properties and have been used for various purposes in medicine.

2. [< L. o] A plant of this genus.

daphnetin (dāf' net-in), n. [< Daphne + -et- + -in] A crystalline substance derived from daphnetin, having the formula  $C_{12}H_{10}O_4 + H_2O$ .

Daphnia (dāf' nī-ā), n. [NL, < Gr. dāphnē: see Daphne.] A genus of minute fresh-water cladoceran entomostracous crustaceans, the type of the family Daphnidae, and representative of the whole order Daphnacea or Cladocera. The species are among the many small crustaceans known as water fleas. The best known species is D. pulex, the 'branch horned water flea', which is a favorite microscopic object. The head is prolonged into a snout, and is provided with a single central compound eye. It is also furnished with antennae which act as oars propelling it through the water by a series of short springs or jerks.

These animals are very abundant in many ponds and ditches, and as they assume a red color in summer, the swarms which abound in stagnant water impart to it the appearance of blood.

Daphniacea (dāf' nī-ā-ā), n. pl. [NL, < Daphnia + -acea.] The water-fleas as a superfamily: same as Cladocera.

daphniaceous (dāf' nī-ā-āshūs), a. Of or pertaining to the Daphniacea.

daphniad (dāf' nī-ad), n. [< Daphnia + -ad] One of the Daphnidae or Daphniacea, a cladoceran crustacean; a water-flea.

daphniid (dāf' nī-id), n. [< Daphnia + -id] Same as daphniad.

Daphnidae (dāf' nī-ī-dē), n. pl. [NL, < Daphnia + -idae.] The family of water-fleas, typified by the genus Daphnia. It is sometimes confounded with the order Cladocera and is then identical with Daphniacea, but it is usually much restricted, as one of about six families into which the daphniads are divided. Also Daphnidae, Daphnidae, Daphnidae, Daphnidae, Daphnidae.

daphnin (dāf' nīn), n. [< Daphne + -in.] A glucoside found in the bark and flowers of plants of the genus Daphne. It forms prismatic transparent crystals, having a bitter taste. It has received the formula  $C_{12}H_{10}O_4 + 2H_2O$ .

daphnioid (dāf' nī-oid), a. and n. [< Daphnia + -oid] 1. A. Resembling or pertaining to the Daphniacea, cladoceran, as a water-flea.

II. n. A cladoceran crustacean.

dari, v. t. An obsolete form of dare.

dars (dār), n. Same as dace, 1.

darapti (dā-rāp' tī), n. The mnemonic name given by Petrus Hispanus to that mood of the third figure of syllogism in which the two premises are universal and affirmative and the conclusion is particular and affirmative. These distinctions of quantity and quality are indicated by the three vowels of the word darapti. The letter p indicates that the reduction to direct reasoning is to be performed by converting by accident the minor premise and the initial d shows that the direct mood so reached is darii. The following is an example of a syllogism in darapti. All griffins breathe fire, but all griffins are animals: there fore, some animals breathe fire. Some logicians deny the validity of this mood.

darbar, n. See darbar.

But this thing dare not

Shak., Tempest, iii. 2

3. To challenge; provoke to action, especially by asserting or implying that one lacks courage to accept the challenge; defy: as, to dare a man to fight.

I taught him how to manage arms, to dare

An enemy, to count both death and dangers

Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, v. 1

I whipt him for robbing an orchard once when he was but a child —

"The farmer dared me to do it," he said, he was always so wild.

Tempsong, Bishop.

4. To arouse; rouse. [Prov. Eng.] — I dare say, I suppose or believe, I presume, I think likely a weak affirmation, generally implying some degree of indifference in assertion or assent.

Joseph E. O. yes, I find great use in that screen.

Sir Peter T. I dare say you must, certainly Shak., School for Scandal, iv. 3

dare (där), n. [< dare, v.] 1. The quality of being daring; venturesomeness; boldness; dash; spirit.

It lends a lustre, and more great opinion,

A larger dare to your great enterprise.

Shak., i. Hen. IV., iv. 1.

2. A challenge; defiance.

Scelus Pompeius

Hath given the dare to Caesar.

Shak., A. and C., i. 1.

To take a dare, to receive a challenge without accepting it. [Colloq.]

It was not consistent with the honor of such a man as Bob to take a dare; so against first one and then another quivering hero he had fought, until at length there was none that ventured any more to "give a dare" to the victor of so many battles.

E. Appleton, The Graysons, x.

dare (där), v. [< ME. daren, darren, darren, more or less in fear, terrify; cf. Sw. dorra, tremble, shiver, = Dan. dorre, tremble, quiver, vibrate, = LG. bedorren, become still, = D. be-

He still in fear; lurk in dread; especially, lie or squat close to the ground, like a frightened bird or hare; look anxiously around, as such a lurking creature.

dark<sup>1</sup> (därk), a. and n. [< ME. dark, derk, doork, a. and n., < AS. deorc, a., dark. Connections uncertain.] I. a. 1. Without light; marked by the absence of light; unilluminated; shadowy: as, a dark night; a dark room.

And after that make the night so dark that no man may see no thing

Manderly, Travels, p. 227.

2. Not radiating or reflecting light; wholly or partially black or gray in appearance; having the quality opposite to light or white: as, a dark object; a dark color.

The sun to me is dark,

And silent as the moon.

Milton, S. A., I. 83.

Lovely in your strength, as is the light
Of a dark eye in woman!

Byron, Childs Harold, III. 92.

A dusky barge.

Dark as a funeral scarf from stem to stern.
Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

3. Not fair: applied to the complexion: as, the dark-skinned races.

And round about the keel with faces pale,
Dark faces pale against that rosy fame,
The mild-eyed melancholy Lotus-eaters came.

Tennyson, Lotus-Eaters.

Differing only as sisters may differ, as when one is of lighter and another of darker complexion.

Gladstone, quoted in S. Duwell's Taxes in England, II. 243.

4. Lacking in light or brightness; shaded; obscure: as, a dark day; the dark recesses of a forest. Hence—5. Characterized by or producing gloom; dreary; cheerless: as, a dark time in the affairs of the country.

So dark a mind within me dwells.

Tennyson, Mand, xv.

There is, in every true woman's heart, a spark of heavenly fire, which . . . beams and blazes in the dark hour of adversity.

Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 39.

Alone, in that dark sorrow, hour after hour crept by.

Whittier, Cassandra Southwick.

6. Threatening; frowning; gloomy; morose: as, a dark scowl.

All men of dark temper, according to their degree of melancholy or enthusiasm, may find converts fitted to their humors.

Addison, Travels in Italy.

So all in wrath he got to horse and went;
While Arthur to the banquet, dark in mood,
Fest, thinking "Is it Lancelot who hath come?"

Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

7. Obscure; not easily perceived or understood; difficult to interpret or explain: as, a dark saying; a dark passage in an author.

What may seem dark at the first will afterward be found more plain.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, I. 1.

What's your dark meaning, mouse, of this light word?

Shak., I. I. L., v. 2.

Wise philosophers hold all writings to be fruitful in the proportion they are dark.

Swift, Tale of a Tub, x.

Hence—8. Concealed; secret; mysterious; inscrutable: as, keep it dark.

Day, mark'd as with some hideous crime,
When the dark hand struck down thro' time,
And cancell'd nature's book.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, lixii.

Precisely what is to be the manner and measure of our knowledge, in this fuller and more glorious revelation of the future, is not clear to us now, for that is one of the dark things, or mysteries, of our present state.

Bucknell, Sermons for New Life, p. 189.

9. Blind; sightless.

I, dark in light, exposed

To daily fraud, contempt, abuse, and wrong.

Milton, S. A., I. 73.

Dr. Heylin (author of Geography) preach'd at St. Abbey.
He was, I think, at this time quite dark, and so had been for some years.

Swift, Diary, March 20, 1691.

Thou wretched daughter of a dark old man Conduct my weary steps.

Dryden and Lee, Edipus.

10. Unenlightened, either mentally or spiritually; characterized by backwardness in learning, art, science, or religion; destitute of knowledge or culture; ignorant; uninstructed; rude; uncivilized: as, the dark places of the earth; the dark ages.

How many waste places are left as dark as Galle of the Gentile, sitting in the region and shadow of death; without preaching Minister, without light!

Milton, Apology for Smectonius.

The age wherein he [Homer] liv'd was dark; but he Could not want light who taught the world to see.

Sir J. Denham, Progress of Learning.

There are dark regions of the earth where we do not expect to find a righteous man.

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLIII. 430.

11. Morally black; atrocious; wicked; sinister.

Fit vessel, fittest imp of fraud, in whom
To enter, and his dark suggestions hide.

Milton, P. L., ix. 90.

Shame from our hearts

Unworthy arts

The fraud designed, the purposes dark.

Whittier, Eve of Election.

Dark ages. See age.—Dark days, specifically, days on which the sun is so completely obscured by clouds or dry mists that artificial lights have to be used for one or more days continuously, and day seems literally turned into night. Such a day was May 19th, 1780, in New England; and others of less extent were August 9th, 1783, and October 21st, 1816. The most remarkable case on record is the dry fog of 1783, when the sun was obscured by a bluish haze for many days in the summer, throughout Europe, northern Africa, and to some extent in Asia and North America.—Dark heat, the heat due to the invisible ultra red heat-rays of the spectrum. See spectrum.—Dark horse. See horse.—Dark moon. See moon.—Dark room, in photog., a room from which all actinic rays of light have been excluded, used in the processes connected with the sensitizing of plates for exposure, for placing the plates in and taking them from the plate-holders or dark slides in which they are transported and exposed in the camera, and for the development of the picture after exposure.

It is most essential in all photographic processes to employ what is termed a dark room. . . . This dark room is not without light, but its light is of a quality such as in no way affects the plate. Spencer, Encyc. Manip., p. 1536.

To keep dark, to be quiet, silent, or secret concerning a matter.

II. a. 1. The absence of light; darkness.

Till the dark was done, & the day sprang,
And the sun in his scarlet set voplo left.

Destruction of Troy (R. E. T. S.), I. 6032.

St. Bruden, p. 2.

dark-house, n. A mad-house.

Love is merely a madness, and, I tell you, deserves as well a dark house and a whip as madmen do.

Shak., As you Like it, III. 2.

darkle (där'-kl), v. i.; pret. and pp. darkied, pp. darking. [Assumed from darling, adv., regarded as a pp.] 1. To appear dark; show indistinctly.

To the right towers Arthur's lofty seat; . . . to the left darken the castle. Shakespeare's Ham.

2. To become dark or gloomy.

His honest brow darkening as he looked towards me.
Thackeray, Newcomes, lvi.

darkling (därk'ling), adv. [= So. darklings; < därk + dim. -ling.]. 1. In the dark.

As the wakeful bird
Sings darkling, and in shallow covert hid, Tunes her nocturnal note. Milton, P. L., III. 39.
That though I wrestle darkling with the fiend,
I shall overcome it. J. Keble.

Hence—2. Blindly; uncertainly.

Do nations float darkling down the stream of the ages,
... swaying with every wind, and ignorant whether they are drifting? Bancroft, Hist. Const., II. 2.

places. See cut under Blaps.

darklings (därk'lings), adv. [So. darklings; <
E. darkling + adverbial suffix -s.]. In the dark.

Thou wouldest fain persuade me to do like some idle wanton servants, who play and talk out their candle-light, and then go darklings to bed. Sp. Hall, Works, VII. 344.

She through the yard the nearest tak'
An' to the kiln she goes then,
An' darkling grapt (gropped) for the banks,
An' in the fine-clue throws them.
Burns, Halloween.

darkly (därk'li), adv. [ME. derkly, derklike,
< AS. deorlice, < deora, E. dark, + -ly, < -ly.]
1. In a dark manner; so as to appear dark; as a dark object or spot.

Vainly the fowler's eye
Might mark thy distant flight to do thee wrong,
As, darkly seen against the crimson sky,
Thy figure floats along.
Bryant, To a Waterfowl.

What forms were those which darkly stood
Just on the margin of the wood?
Whittier, Pentucket.

2. Blindly; as one deprived of sight; with uncertainty.

The spere lets don, ren the hed, be-forn lets goo;
After my fewed, derkly, as man bynd.
Rom. of Parment (R. E. T. S.), I. 4478.

3. Dimly; obscurely; faintly; imperfectly.

For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face. 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

In other great disputes it answers dubiously and darkly to the common reader. Milton, Areopagitica, p. 19.

4. Mysteriously; with sinister vagueness: as, it was darkly hinted that murder had been committed.

How darkly, and how deadly, dost thou speak!
Your eyes do menace me. Shak., Rich. III., I. 4. darkness (därk'nes), n. [ME. derkness, darkness; < därk + -ness.] 1. The absolute or comparative absence of light, or the modification of visual sensation produced by such absence; gloom. It may be due either (a) to a deficient illumination, or (b) to a low degree of luminosity or transparency in the dark object.

Darkness was upon the face of the deep. Gen. 1. 2.
A Province of the Centre, that hath the wel in crouyt's fornages, that men clepen Hanyon, is alle covered with Darkness, with outen oon brightnesse or light; so that no man may see no here, no no man dar enter in to hem.
Wendecore, Travels, p. 390.

Darkness might then be defined as either at rest; light as other in motion. But in reality the ether is never at rest, for in the absence of light-waves we have heat-waves always speeding through it. Tyndall, Radiation, § 2.

2. Secrecy; concealment; privacy.

What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light.
Mat. x. 27.

Though lately we intended
To keep in darkness what occasion now Reveals. Shak., T. N., v. 1.

3. The state of being blind physically; blindness.

His eyes, before they had their will,
Were darved into darkness in his head.
Tennyson, Godiva.

Hence—4. Mental or spiritual blindness; lack of knowledge or enlightenment, especially in religion and morality: as, heathen darkness.

Men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. John iii. 19.

The Barbary States, after the decline of the Arabian power, were enveloped in darkness, rendered more palpable by the increasing light among the Christian nations.
Bunsen, Orations, I. 219.

Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the Christ that is to be.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cvi.

5. The kingdom of the evil one; hell: as, the powers of darkness.

Descend to darkness and the burning lake:
False fiend, avoid! Shak., 2 Hen. VI., I. 4.

6. The gloom and obscurity of the grave; death.

If I must die,
I will encounter darkness as a bride,
And hug it in mine arms.
Shak., M. for M., III. 1.

7. Obscurity of meaning; lack of clearness or intelligibility.

The use of old words is not the greatest cause of Sal-ustian roughness and darkness.

Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 150.

Let others therefore dread and shun the Scriptures for their darkness. I shall wish I may deserve to be reckon'd among those who admire and dwell upon them for their clearness. Milton, Church-Government, Prof.

The prince of darkness, the devil; Satan. —Syn. Darkness, Obscurity, Dimness, Gloom. Darkness is the opposite of light, physical or mental, and indicates the complete, or approximately complete, absence of it. Obscurity is the state of being overclouded or concealed through the intervention of something which obstructs or shuts out the light, causing objects to be imperfectly illuminated:
as, the obscurity of a landscape; the style of this author is full of obscurity. Dimness is indistinctness caused by the intervention of an imperfectly transparent medium, or by imperfection in the eye of the person looking; it is specifically applied to the sight itself: as, dimness of vision. Gloom is deep shade, approaching absolute darkness, but is now much less often used in that sense, or in the sense of a corresponding darkness of mind, than to express a state of feeling akin to darkness; the lack of ability to see light ahead; deep despondency; lack of hope or joy: as, he lived in constant gloom.

Yet from those flames
No light, but rather darkness visible.
Milton, P. L., I. 62.

Obscurity of expression generally springs from confusion of ideas. Macaulay, Macbride.

The stores had a twilight of dimness; the air was spely with mingled odors. G. W. Curtis, True and I, p. 62.

A change comes over me like that which befalls the traveller when clouds overspread the sky. . . . and gloom settles down upon his uncertain way, till he is lost.
Channing, Perfect Life, p. 94.

darksome (därk'sum), a. [< dærk + -some.] Somewhat dark; gloomy; shadowy: as, a dark-some house; a darksome cloud. [Poetical.]

A darksome way, which no man could descry,
That deep descended through the hollow ground.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 30.

The darksome pine that o'er yon rocks reclin'd.
Pope, Epics to Abigail, I. 158.

They crouched then close in the darksome shade,
They quaked all o'er with awe and fear.
J. R. Drake, Outpost Fay, p. 45.

darky (där'ki), n.; pl. darkies (-kis). [Also written, less prop., darkey; < dærk + dim. -y.]
1. A negro; a colored person. [Colloq.]

The manners of a cornfield darky.
The Century, XXVII. 122.

2. A policeman's lantern; a bull's-eye. Dickens. [Slang.]

darling (där'ling), n. and a. [Early mod. E.
also derling and dearling; < ME. derling, derling, deorling, < AS. deorling, a favorite, < deor, dear, + dim. -ling.] 1. n. One who is very dear;
one much beloved; a special favorite.

The darlings of delight. Spenser, F. Q., VI. viii. 43.

And can do nought but wall her darling's loss.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., III. 1.

Any man who puts his life in peril in a cause which is esteemed becomes the darling of all men.

Shore, Courage.

2. a. Very dear; peculiarly beloved; favorite; regarded with great affection and tenderness; lovingly cherished: as, a darling child.

Some darling sciences. Watts, Improvement of Mind.

The love of their country is still, I hope, one of their darling virtues. Goldsmith, Essays, Acem.

darlingness (där'ling-ness), n. Dearness. Browning. [Rare.]

Darlingtonia (där-ling-tó'ní-s), n. [NL., named after Dr. William Darlington, a botanist of Philadelphia (1783-1833).] A remarkable genus of American pitcher-plants, natural order Sarracenaceae. A single species is known, D. californica, from the mountain swamps of northern California. The leaves are trumpet-shaped, sometimes 3 feet long, with a vaulted, dilated hood, which terminates in a large hooked appendage above the contracted orifice. The under side of the leaf is winged, and a sweet secretion is found along this wing and about the orifice. The tube within is beset with rigid hairs directed downward, and the bottom is filled with a liquid which has a digestive effect upon the numerous insects that are entrapped.

Darlingtonia Californica.

darn¹ (därn), v. t. [Prob. of Celtic origin: < W.
darnio, piece, also break in pieces, tear (= Bret. darnau, divide into pieces), < darn, a piece, fragment, patch, =
Corn. and Bret.
darn, a fragment, piece,

whence prob. F. darn, a slice (of some fishes).]

China sea; darn they lousy typhoon."
H. Kingsley, Ravenshoe, vi.

darn³ (därn), a. and v. Same as *darn*¹.

darnation (där-nä'shon), interj. A minced form of damnation, used as an exclamation. [Low.]

darnel (där'nel), n. and a. [< ME. darnel, dernel (taking the place of the earlier cockle), < F.
dial. (Rouen) darnelle, darnel, prob. so named from its (supposed) stupefying or intoxicating qualities; cf. OF. darno, stu-pefied; Sw. där-repe, also simply repe, darnel, the first syllable repr. dära, infatuate, cf. däre = Dan. daare, a fool.] 1. n. The popular name of Lolium temulentum, one of the few reputed deleterious grasses. It is sometimes frequent in the wheat-fields of Europe, and the grains when ground with the wheat have been believed to produce narcotic and stupefying effects upon the system. Recent investigations tend to prove this belief to be erroneous. The name was used by the early herbalists to include all kinds of corn-field weeds.

Darnel (Lolium temulentum).

He [the devil] every day laboureth to sow cockle and darnel. Luther, Sermon of the Plough.

Darnel, and all the idle weeds that grow in our sustaining corn. Shak., Lear, iv. 4.

2. a. Like darnel. [Poetical.]

No darned fancy
Might choke one useful blade in Furitan fields.
Lowell, Under the Willows.

Darnell's case. See *case*¹.

darnier (där'nér), n. 1. One who mends by darning.—2. A darning-needle. Dict. of Needlework.

darnet, darnio, n. Same as darnick.

With a fair darnet carpet of my own.
Fletcher (and another), Noble Gentleman, v. 1.

darning (där'ning), n. [Verbal n. of *darn*¹, v.]
1. The act of mending by imitation of texture.

Supposing those stockings of Sir John's ended with some degree of consciousness at every particular darning.
Martineau Strickland.

2. Articles to be darned: as, the week's darning lay on the table.

darning-ball (där'ning-bál), n. A spherical or egg-shaped piece of wood, ivory, glass, or other hard substance, over which an article to be darned is drawn smooth.

darning-needle (där'ning-né'dl), n. 1. A long needle with a large eye, used in darning.—2.

The dragon-fly; the devil's darning-needle. See dragon-fly. [U. S.]

darning-stitch (där'ning-stich), n. A stitch used in darning, imitating more or less closely the texture of the fabric darned. It is used both in mending and in decorative work.

Darnis (där'nis), n. [NL.] 1. A genus of homopterous insects, of the family Membracidae, or referred to the family Ceroptidae.—2. A genus of butterflies, of the family Erycinidae.

darnix, n. Same as dornick.

daroo-tree (da-rü'trë), n. The Ficus Sycomorus, or Egyptian sycamore.

darra (dar'ä), n. Same as darra.

darrain, n. Same as derrain.

derrain (dar'än), n. [OF. derrain, derrain, derrain, F. dial. (Rouchi) derrain = Pr. dervier, last, < ML. as if **derrivarius* (cf. F. dervier, < ML. as if **derrivarius*), < L. d., from, + retro, back: see retro- and derris.] In old law, last: as, derrin continuance; derrin presentment.

The great charter of John likewise retains the three recognitions of Novel disseisin, Mort d'ancestor, and Derrin presentment, to be heard in the quarterly county courts by the justices and four chosen knights. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 164.

darria (dar'i-bä), n. A modern dry measure of Egypt, equal to about 16 Winchester bushels.

darria (dar'is), n. [NL., < Gr. däpäs, excoriation, < däpäs, skin, flay, = AS. teras, E. tear, q. v. Cf. derma, etc.] The removal of the skin from the subjacent tissues; an abrasion of the skin.

dart (där't), n. [ME. dart, < OF. dart, also dard, dar, F. dard = Pr. dart = Sp. Pg. dardo = Wall. darde = Hung. darda, < ML. dartus, dartus, a dart; of Teut. origin: AS. dartoð, darath, dareth = OHG. tart, a dart, javelin, = Icel. darradr, a dart, javelin, peg (also in simpler form darr, pl. dörr, neuk, mod. dör, m., a dart), = Sw. dart, a dagger.] 1. A pointed missile weapon thrown or thrust by the hand; a small and light spear or javelin, sometimes hurled by the aid of a strap or thong.

And he [Joah] took three darts in his hand, and thrust them through the heart of Absalom. 2 Sam. xviii. 14.

Death 'ere thou hast slain another, Learn'd, and fair, and good as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee.
B. Jonson, Epitaph on the Countess of Pembroke.

2. A kind of eel-spear. [Eng.]

The dart is made of a cross piece with barbed spikes set in like the teeth of a rake.

Day, Fishes of Great Britain and Ireland, II. 246.

3. A spear set up as a prize for victory in running or other athletic contests.

The dart is set up of virginities,
Cacchæ who may, who renneth best, let see.
Cheucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, I. 75.

4. Anything like a dart in shape, use, or effect. Specifically—(a) The missile or arrow of a blow-gun when made with a point. (b) In entom., the sting of an aculeate hymenopterous insect; in a more restricted sense, the spicula or lancet-like instrument forming the central part of the sting.

Until recently the latter [Sonitis nitidus] was supposed to be the sole member of its genus which possessed a dart; now the former [S. encephalus] keeps it company. Science, III. 342.

(c) In conch., a love-dart, or spiculum amoris. (d) One of various moths, so called by British collectors. (e) A seam uniting two edges of stuff from between which a gore has been cut away designed to shape a garment to the figure. (f) Figuratively, a piercing look or utterance.

If there be such a dart in prince's frowns,
How durst thy tongue move anger to our face?
Shak., Pericles, I. 2.

It is certain that a good many fallacies and prejudices are limping about with one of his light darts sticking to them.
H. James, Jr., Matthew Arnold.

5. A sudden swift movement.—egg and dart. See egg.

dart (där't), v. [ME. darten; from the noun.] 1. trans. 1. To throw with a sudden thrust, as a pointed instrument.

Th' invaders dart their javlins from afar.
Dryden, Shak.

2. To shoot or thrust suddenly or rapidly; omit; to throw: as, the sun darted forth his beams.

With skill her eyes dart o'er every glance.
Congreve, Amoret.

The moon was darting through the lattices its yellow light warm as the beams of day.
Shelley, Revolt of Islam, iv. 3.

3. To pierce; spear; transfix.

The wilde hole bygyneth spryngs
Now here, now there, darted to the berte.
Cheucer, Troilus, iv. 360.

But they of Aconmachs use stones like unto lancets headed with bone. With these they dart fish swimming in the water. Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 183.

A black lion rampant, sore that bled
With a field arrow darted through the head.
Drayton, Agincourt.

II. intrans. 1. To have the piercing movement or effect of a dart; move swiftly, like a dart.

Right thro' his manful breast darted the pang.
Tennyson, Geraint.

And watch the airy swallows as they darted round the caves. T. B. Aldrich, Kathie Morris.

2. To spring or start suddenly and run swiftly: as, the deer darted from the thicket.

In the evening of the seventeenth of June, Rupert darted out of Oxford with his cavalry on a predatory expedition.
Macaulay, Nugent's Hampden.

dart (där't), n. [Same as dare, dar, and dace, all ult. identical with dart; so called from its swift movements.] Same as dace, 1.

dartars (där'tär), n. pl. [F. darre, tetter.] A scab or ulceration under the skin of a lamb. Also called cham-scab.

darter (där'tär), n. 1. One who throws a dart.

They of Rhene and Lenoce, cunning darters,
And Nequans that well could manage steeds Marlowe, tr. of Lucan, I.

2. One who or that which springs or darts forward.

The finny darter with the glittering scales. Byron.

3. In zoöl.: (a) In ichth.: (1) The archerfish, Toxotes jaculator. (2) One of the freshwater fishes of the United States constituting the subfamily Etheostominae of the family Percidae. All are of small size, and in general resemble the common yellow perch. The name is due to the fact that when disturbed they dart from their retreats, where they usually remain quiescent, on or near the bottom of streams. (3) A fresh-water fish of the genus Uranidea and family Cottidae. [Local, U. S.] (b) In ornith.: (1) A bird of the genus Ploceus and family Ploceidae. P. senegalensis is the black-bellied darter, snake-bird, or water-turkey so called from the way it darts upon its prey on the wing. See snake-bird, Ploceus, and cut under ankings. (2) pl. The Ploceidae or snake-birds.

Dartus (Toxotes jaculator)

darter-fish (där'tär-fish), n. Same as archerfish.

Dartford warbler. See warbler.

dartingly (där'ting-ly), adv. Rapidly; like a dart.

dartle (där'tl), v. t. or i.; pret. and pp. dartled, ppr. dartling. [Freq. of dart, v.] To dart; shoot out. [Rare.]

My star that dartles the red and the blue.
Browning, My Star.

dart-moth (där't'möth), n. A noctuid moth of the genus Agrotis (which see). The larvae are among those known as cutworms.

Dartmouth College case. See case.

dartoid (där'toid), a. and n. [F. dartos + -oid.] 1. a. In anat., pertaining to, resembling, or consisting of dartos; having slow involuntary contractility excitable by cold or mechanical stimulus, as the dartos.—Dartoid tissue, in anat., tissue resembling that of the dartos.

II. n. The dartoid tissue or tunic; the dartos.

dartos (där'tos), n. [NL., < Gr. dartós, verbal adj. of däpäs, skin, flay: see darels.] A layer of connective tissue containing unstriated muscular fiber, situated immediately beneath the skin of the scrotum.

dartré (där'tr), n. [F.: see dartars.] Herpes: used to designate almost all cutaneous diseases.

dartrous (där'trus), a. [F. dartrous, < dartré: see dartré and -ous.] Relating or subject to dartré; herpetic.

dart-sac (där'tsäk), n. In pulmonate gastropods, the sac which secretes and contains the love-dart, or spiculum amoris; a thick-walled everlasting appendage of the generative apparatus of the snail, in which the love-darts are molded as calcareous concretions, and from which they are ejected.

Closely to them [the digitate accessory glands] is the remarkable dart-sac, a thick-walled sac, in the lumen of which a crystalline four-sided red or dart consisting of carbonate of lime is found.

E. R. Lanbester, Ensay. Bot., XVI. 681.

dart-snake (där'tsäk), n. A book-name of the serpent-like lizards of the genus Acontias,

Dart-snake (Acontias melanocephalus)

translating the generic term: so called from the manner in which it darts upon its prey. See Acontias.

darweeah (där'weeh), n. Same as dervish.

Darwinella (där-wi-nel'ä), n. [NL., named after Charles Darwin, + dim. -ella.] A genus of ceratose sponges, typical of the family Darwinellidae.

darwinellid (där-wi-nel'id), n. A sponge of the family Darwinellidae.

Darwinellids (där-wi-nel'id-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Darwinella + -ids.] A family of ceratose sponges. They have large pouch-shaped flagellated chambers, communicating by means of numerous pores in their walls with inhalant cavities, and by means of one wide mouth with exhalant cavities. The ground mass is without granules and transparent, and the axis of the fibers is thick.

Darwinian (där-wi-n'ian), a. and n. [F. Darwin + -ian.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Charles Darwin, the celebrated English naturalist, or to the theory of development propounded by him. See Darwinism.

Our artists are so generally convinced of the truth of the Darwinian theory that they do not always think it necessary to show any difference between the foliage of an elm and an oak. Ruskin, Lectures on Art, p. 105.

That struggle for existence against adverse external conditions, which . . . has been harped upon too exclusively by the Darwinian school. Darwin, Origin of World, p. 238.

Darwinian curvature. See curvature.

II. n. One who favors or accepts the theory of development or evolution propounded by Darwin. See evolution.

Darwinianism (där-wi-n'ian-izm), n. [F. Darwin + -ism.] Same as Darwinism.

Darwinical (där-wi-n'ial), a. [F. Darwin + -ical.] Same as Darwinian. [Rare.]

Darwinically (där-wi-n'ial-ly), adv. After the manner of Darwin; as a Darwinian; in accordance with the Darwinian doctrine of development. [Rare.]

It is one thing to say, Darwinically, that every detail observed in an animal's structure is of use to it, or has been of use to its ancestors; and quite another to affirm, teleologically, that every detail of an animal's structure has been created for its benefit. Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 304.

Darwinism (där-wi-n-izm), n. [F. Darwin (see def.) + -ism.] 1. The body of biological doctrine propounded and defended by the English naturalist Charles (Charles Robert) Darwin (1809-1882), especially in his works "The Origin of Species" (1859) and "The Descent of Man" (1871), respecting the origin of species. It is, in general, the theory that all forms of living organisms, including man, have been derived or evolved by descent, with modification or variation, from a few primitive forms of life or from one, during the struggle for existence of individual organisms, which results, through natural selection, in the survival of those least exposed, by reason of their organization or situation, to destruction. It is not to be confounded with the general views of the development or evolution of the visible order of nature which have been entertained by philosophers from the earliest times. (See evolution.) That which is especially and properly Darwinian is the general theory of evolution viewed in the manner, or method, or means by which living organisms are developed or evolved from one another; namely, the inherent susceptibility and tendency to variation according to conditions of environment; the preservation and perfection of organs best suited to the needs of the individual in its struggle for existence; the perpetuation of the more favorably organized beings, and the destruction of those less fitted to survive; the operation of natural selection, in which sexual selection is an important factor; and the general proposition that at any given time any given organism represents the result of the foregoing factors, acting in opposition to the hereditary tendency to adhere to the type, or "breed true." See selection and survival.

2. Belief in and support of Darwin's theory.

Also Darwinism.

Darwinist (där-wîn-ist), n. [< Darwin + -ist.]

A believer in Darwinism; a Darwinian.

Darwinistic (där-wîn-istik), a. [< Darwinist

+ -ic.] Same as Darwinian.

Darwinism (där-wîn-iz), n. 1. & pret. and pp.

Darwinised, ppr. Darwinising. [< Darwin +

-ism.] To accept the biological theories of Charles Darwin.

The last word of the scientific theory of evolution is that very terrifying word, anarchy, so eloquently anath-ematised "ex cathedra" by Darwinian sociologists and so many others. Contemporary Rev., L. 485.

Darwinian, n. See darwinist.

Dascillidæ (da-sil-lid-æ), n. pl. [NL., < Dascil- lus + -idæ.] A family of sericicorn pentamerous beetles, typified by the genus Dascillus.

They have the ventral segments free, the first of which is not elongate; the head not constricted behind; the eyes granulated; the mesothoracic epimeron reaching the coxae, of which the front pair is transverse and the hind pair subulate for reception of the femora; and the tarsi 5-joint-

ed. Same as Cyphonidæ.

Dascillus (da-sil-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. dâskallōs, the name of a fish; cf. dâskalos, thick-shaded, bushy, < da-, an intensive prefix, + skâs, shade, shadow.] 1.

The typical genus of beetles of the family Dascillidæ. 2. cor- vinus is an example. Also De- scyllus. Latreille, 1796.—3. In tothâs, a genus of pomacentroid fishes. Also Dascyllus. Cuvier,

1839. Also called Tetradrach- maus.

daser, daserwet, r. See dacr.

dash (dash), v. [< ME. dâsch-

en, dâsen, rush with violence, strike with violence, < Dan. dâske = Sw. daska, slap, strike, beat. Cf. dush.] I. trans. 14. To strike suddenly and violently; give a sudden blow to.

With that she dash'd her on the lips,

So dy'd double red.

Hard was the heart that gave that blow,

Soft were the lips that bled

Warner, Queen Eleanor and Fair Rosamond.

9. To cause to strike suddenly and with violence; throw or thrust violently or suddenly;

as, to dash one stone against another; to dash water on the face.

They shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. Mat. iv. 6

A foot more light, a step more true,

He'er from the heath-flower dashed the dew.

Scott, l. of the L, i. 18.

3. To break by collision or by strokes; shatter.

For he departed his shield was all to dash that the thriddle part ne left not hool, and his hauberkis mayled and his helme perced. Morte d'Arthur (E. E. T. S.), iii. 443.

A brave vessel . . .

Dash'd all to pieces. Shak, Tempest, l. 2.

4. To scatter or sprinkle something over; bes-pat; sprinkle; splash; suffuse.

Vast basins of marble dashed with perpetual cascades.

Waggon, Modern Gardening.

And all his greaves and cuisses dash'd with drops

Of onset. Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

Dashed with blushes for her slighted love.

Addison, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph.

5. To place, make, mark, sketch, etc., in a hasty manner.

Then came a postscript dash'd across the rest.

Tennyson, Princess, v.

6. To throw something into so as to produce a mixture; mingle; mix; adulterate: as, to dash wine with water; the story is dashed with fables; to dash fire-damp with pure air (said in coal-mining: see dash).

Learn to know the great desire that hypocrites have to find one craft or other to dash the truth with.

Tyndale, Ana. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1880), p. 323.

He had sent up wine so heavily dash'd that those poor men of the city who were not so much accustomed to drink as those of his retinue were extremely intoxicated.

Comical Hist. of France.

Notable virtues are sometimes dashed with notorious vices. Sir P. Browne, Christ. Mor., l. 23.

His cheerfulness [is] dashed with apprehension.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 1.

7. To cast down; thrust out or aside; impede;

frustrate; abate; lower.

I see, this hath a little dash'd your spirits.

Dascillus coronatus.
(Line shown natural size.)

Dash the proud gambler in his glided car.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. l. 107.

To dash in, to paint or write rapidly: as, to dash in the color of the details.—To dash off, to form or sketch out basely; write with great rapidity: as, to dash off an article for a newspaper.—To dash out, (a) To knock out by beating against something; as, to dash out one's brains against a wall. (b) To snare at a stroke; strike out; blot out or obliterate: as, to dash out a line or a word. (c) To strike out or form at a blow; produce suddenly.

Never was dash'd out, at one lucky hit,

A fool so just a copy of a wit;

So like, that critics said, and courtiers swore,

A wit it was, and called the phantom More.

Pope, Dunciad, II. 47.

=Eyn. Dash, Smash, Shatter, Shiver, Crash, Nash. That which is dashed does not necessarily go to pieces: if it is broken, the fact is commonly expressed. That which is smashed, shattered, or shivered is dashed to pieces and dearly, with violence, at a blow or in a collision. Smash- ing is the roughest and most violent of the three acts;

the word expresses the most complete disruption or ruin as, the drunken soldier smashed (shattered, shivered) the mirror with the butt of his musket. The use of smash or crash (as, his head was smashed, I smashed my finger) is colloquial. Shatter and shiver differ in that shat- ter suggests rather the flying of the parts, and shiver the breaking of the substance; and the pieces are more numerous or smaller with shiver. That which is crushed or mashed is broken down under pressure; that which is mashed becomes a shapeless mass: sugar and rock are crushed into powder, small particles, or bits; apples are crushed or mashed into pulp in making cider; boiled potatoes are mashed, not crushed, in preparing them for the table.

They that stand high have many blasts to shake them,

And, if they fall, they dash themselves to pieces.

Shak, Rich. III., l. 2.

A voice cried aloud, "Ay, ay, divil, all's right! We've smashed 'em" [machines]. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, II.

You may be mad, you may shatter the vase if you will,

But the scent of the roses will hang round it still.

Moore, Farwell! but whenever, etc.

All the ground

With shiver'd armour strown.

Milton, P. L., vi. 389.

The ostrich . . . leaveth her eggs in the earth . . . and forgetteth that the foot may crush them. Job xxxix. 13-15.

To break the claw of a crab or a lobster, clap it between the sides of the dining room door; . . . thus you can do it gradually without masking the meat.

Swift, Advice to Servants, The Footman.

II. trans. 1. To rush with violence; move rapidly and vehemently.

All the long-kept stream of life

Dash'd downward in a cataclysm.

Tennyson, Day-Dream, The Revival

On the 4th his [Johnston's] cavalry dashed down and captured a small pick-guard of six or seven men.

U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 333.

2. To use rapidly in performance, so as to display force seemingly without care, as in painting or writing.

With just, bold lines he dashes here and there,

Showing great mastery with little care.

Rochester, Allusion to Horace.

dash (dash), n. [< dash, v.] 1. A violent striking together of two bodies; collision.

The dash of clouds Thompson, Summer, l. 1114

2. A sudden check; frustration; abashment:

as, his hopes met with a dash.

Though it were Knor himself, the Restorer of a Kingdom, that spake it, they will not pardon him their dash.

Milton, Areopagitica, p. 32.

3. An impetuous movement; a quick stroke or blow; a sudden onset: as, to make a dash upon the enemy.

This jumping upon things at first dash will destroy all.

Selden, Table-Talk, p. 23.

The dash of the brook from the alder-glen.

Bryant, Two Graves

I feared it was possible that [the enemy] might make a rapid dash upon Crump's and destroy our transports and stores. U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 334.

4. A small infusion or admixture; something mingled with something else, especially to qualify or adulterate it: as, the wine has a dash of water.

Innocence when it has in it a dash of folly.

Addison, Spectator, No. 245.

A morose ruffian with a dash of the pirate in him.

Emerson, Compensation

5. The capacity for unhesitating, prompt action, as against an enemy; vigor in attack: as, the corps was distinguished for dash.

The hunting of Taber Sherrif and his brothers was su-perlatively beautiful: with an immense amount of dash there was a cool, sportsman-like manner in their mode of attack. Sir S. W. Baker, Heart of Africa, p. 157.

Their troops outnumbered ours more than two to one,

and fought with considerable dash.

N. A. Rev., CXLIH. 46.

6. A flourish; an ostentatious parade.

She was a first-rate ship, the old Victor was, though I suppose she wouldn't cut much of a dash now 'longside of some of the new clippers. E. O. Jewett, Deephaven, p. 184.

7. (a) In writing and printing, a horizontal stroke or line of varying length, used as a mark of punctuation and for other purposes; specifically, in printing, a type the face of which consists of such a line. The dashes regularly furnished in a font of type are called respectively the en dash

(—, a square of the size of the font), the em dash (—, half a square), the two-em dash (—, two squares), and the three- em dash (—, three squares). In punctuation, the en dash is used to note a sudden transition or break of continuity in a sentence, more marked than that indicated by a comma, and also at the beginning and end of a parenthetical clause—properly of one more directly related to the general sense than a true parenthesis. (See paren- thesis.) The em or the en dash is often used to indicate the omission of the intermediate terms of a series which are to be supplied in reading, being thus often equivalent to

"to . . . inclusive": thus, Mark iv. 30, or 3-20 (that is, verses 3 to 20, inclusive), the years 1880-86 (that is, 1880 to 1886). As a mark of hiatus or suppression, the dash— usually one of the longer ones—stands for something omitted, as a name or part of a name, the concluding words of an unfinished sentence, or the connecting words of a series of broken sentences. Various other more or less arbitrary uses are made of dashes, as in place of de (deho) to indicate repetition of names in a catalogue or the like, as a dividing line between sections, articles, or other portions of matter, etc.

Observe well the dash too, at the end of this Name.

Wycherley, Plain Dealer, v. 1.

(b) In printing, also, a line (variously modified in form) used for the separation of distinct portions of matter, as the parallel dash (—),

the double dash

dasher-block (dash'er-blok), n. Naut., a small block at the extremity of the spanker-gaff, for reefing the ensign-halyards. See cut on preceding page.

dash-guard (dash'gürd), n. A metal plate which protects the platform of a street-car from the mud or snow which might be thrown upon it by the horses.

dashing (dash'ing), p. a. [pp. of dash, v.] 1. Performed with or at a dash; impetuous; spirited: as, a dashing charge.

On the 4th Van Dorn made a dashing attack, hoping, no doubt, to capture Rosecrans before his reinforcements could come up. U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 416.

2. Showy; brilliant: as, a dashing fellow.

"But the society is very good still, is it not?" "Oh, very genteel," said the man, "but not so dashing as it used to be." Bulwer, Pelham.

3. Ostentatious; bold; dashy.

dashingly (dash'ing-li), adv. In a dashing manner; with dash.

dashism (dash'izm), n. [< dash + -ism.] The character or state of being dashing; the state of being a dasher. [Rare.]

He must fight a duel before his claims to . . . dashism can be universally allowed. Knox, Winter Evenings, xviii.

dash-lamp (dash'lamp), n. A small lantern with a reflector, designed to be hung upon the dash-board of a carriage.

dash-pot (dash'pot), n. 1. A cylinder containing a loosely fitted piston, and partly filled with fluid, designed to check sudden movements in a piece of mechanism to which it is attached. — 2. A device sometimes used for controlling the motion of an arc-lamp, and in other electrical instruments. It generally consists of a closed chamber filled with a viscous liquid, in which a piston moves. The resistance offered by the liquid prevents a sudden movement of the part to which the piston is attached.

dash-rule (dash'röl), n. In printing, a metallic rule having on it a line or lines shorter than the width of the column in a newspaper or the page in a book, used to separate one subject from another. See rule.

dash-wheel (dash'hwöl), n. In cotton-manuf., a wheel with compartments, partly submerged in a cistern, in which it revolves. It serves by its rotation to wash and rinse calico in the piece, by alternately dipping it in the water and dashing it from side to side of the compartment. E. H. Knight.

dashy (dash'i), a. [< dash + -y.] Calculated to attract attention; showy; stylish; dashing. It was a dashy bouchée, drawn by a glossy-black span. J. T. Townbridge, Coupon Book, p. 66.

I saw his dashy wife arranging a row of Johannine bottles. National Baptist, XIX. 18.

dasherbird, dasyberd, n. [ME., also dasyberd, doesberde, donsiberde, donsiberde; appar. < "dasy" or "dasy" (< Icel. daskn, laxy, dask, a laxy fellow; cf. Sw. dasy, idle, Dan. dösig (= LG. dösig), drowsy; see dase, dnce) + berd, beard. Cf. dastard.] A dullard; a simpleton; a fool.

Duribusus, that never openeth his mouth, a dastberde. Medulla, in Prompt. Parv., p. 114, note.

There is a dastberd I woulde dere, That walkes abroad wilde were. Chester Plays, I. 301.

Dasmia (das'mi-ä), n. [NL.; also and prop. Dasmia; < Gr. dasyus, bound, < dasye, a band, bond.] The typical genus of corals of the family Dasmidae.

Dasmidae (das-mi'dä), n. pl. [NL., < Dasmia + -idae.] A family of aporose corals. See Pseudoturbinoidea.

Dasornis (da-sör'nis), n. [NL. for **Dasyornis*, < Gr. dasyr, thick, dense, hairy (= L. densus, dense), + ornus, a bird.] A genus of fossil Eocene birds of large size combining dinornithic and struthionian characters, based by R. Owen upon a fragmentary skull from the island of Sheppey in England.

dase (das), n. See dase.

dase (das), n. [A var. of dase.] A small landing-place. [Scotch.]

They soon reached a little dase in the middle of . . . a small landing place. Hogg, Brownie, ii. 61.

dasy (das'i), n.; pl. dassies (-iz). [Native name.] The southern hyrax or rock-rabbit of the Cape of Good Hope, Hyrax capensis.

dastard (das'tärd), n. and a. [*< ME. dastard, a dullard, prob. formed with suffix -ard, from a Scand. base repr. by Icel. dastir, exhausted, breathless (= Sw. dial. däst, weary), pp. of dase, groan, lose breath from exhaustion; Icel. dastadr, exhausted, pp. of dastak, become exhausted, reflexive of *dase = Sw. dase, lie idle, whence E. dase, q. v. Cf. OD. dascort, dascort, a fool, prob. of same origin. See also dastberd.*] 1. A dullard; a simpleton.

Dafe, or dastard, or he that spekythe not yn tymes, oridurna. . . . Dastard, or dullard, or durbustia. Prompt. Parv.

Dastard, [F.] estourdy, butarin. Palagress.

2. A base coward; a poltroon; one who meanly shrinks from danger, or who performs malicious actions in a cowardly, sneaking manner.

This dastard, at the battle of Falay, . . . Before we met, or that a stroke was given, Like to a trusty squire did run away. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 1.

But ill the dastard kept his oath, Whose cowardice hath undone us both. Scott, Marmion, II. 92.

—Sp. 2. Poltroon, Coward, etc. See coward.

3. A. Characterized by base cowardice; meanly shrinking from danger, or from the consequences of malicious acts.

Curse on their dastard souls! Addison.

At this paltry price did the dastard prince consent to stay his arm at the only moment when it could be used effectively for his country. Precourt, Ferd. and Is., I. 13.

dastard (das'tärd), c. i. [< dastard, n.] 1. To make dastard; intimidate; dispirit.

There is another man within me, that's angry with me, rebukes, commands, and dastards me. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, II. 7.

Dastards many souls with hope and fear. Dryden, Indian Emperor, II. 2.

2. To call one dastard or coward. [Rare in both uses.] dastardice (das'tär-dis), n. [< dastard + -ice, after cowardice.] Cowardice; dastardliness.

I was upbraided with ingratitude, dastardice, and all my difficulties with my angel charged upon myself, for want of following my blows. Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, VI. 49.

dastardise (das'tär-dis), v. t.; pret. and pp. dastardised, ppr. dastardising. [< dastard + -ise.] To make dastard; cow. [Rare.]

I believe it is not in the Power of Plowden to dastardise or cow your Spirits until you have overcome him. Howell, Letters, I. 1. 9.

For if he liv'd, and we were conquerors, He had such things to urge against our marriage As, now declar'd, would blunt my sword in battle, And dastardise my courage. Dryden, Don Sebastian, II. 2.

dastardliness (das'tärd-li-nes), n. Cowardice.

dastardly (das'tärd-li), a. Characterized by gross cowardice; meanly timid; base; sneaking.

Brawl and clamour is so arrant a mark of a dastardly wretch that he does as good as call himself so that uses it. Sir R. L. Estlin.

If Dryden is never dastardly, as Pope often was, so also he never wrote anything so maliciously depreciatory as Pope's unprovoked attack on Addison. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 70.

dastardness (das'tärd-nes), n. The character of a dastard; base timidity. [Rare.]

dastardy (das'tär-di), n. [< dastard + -y.] Dastardliness; base cowardice. [Rare.]

dasturi (das-tü-ri), n. [< Hind. dastür, perquisites, commission, < dastir, custom, usage, customary fee, < Pers. dastir, a custom.] The commission, gratuity, or bribe surreptitiously paid by native dealers and others in India to agents, servants, and employees, in order to secure the custom of their masters. Also spelled dastours.

No doubt presents were received from native contractors, and dastours or commission from native dealers and manufacturers. J. T. Wheeler, Short Hist. India, p. 527.

dawet, v. See dase.

Dasya (das'i-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. dasyr, thick, dense, shaggy, hairy, rough, = L. densus, thick; see dase.] A genus of marine algae, belonging to the order Floridales. The fronds are bright-red, filiform or compressed, branching, and polysiphonous. The genus is especially characterized by the monophyllous filaments which clothe the frond or its upper part, and in which the tetrasporous are borne in regular rows. There are about 70 species, mostly tropical, many occurring on the coast of Australia. Dasya siliqua is a beautiful species, common in the United States, from Cape Cod southward, and in the Adriatic sea; it is called chordila.

dasyberd, n. See dastberd.

Dasygaster (das-i-gas'trë), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dasyr, shaggy, hairy, + gaster, belly.] In Latreille's system of classification, a group of Apidae or bees, having the under side of the abdomen of the female hairy, as in the genera Megachile, Anthidium, etc. The mason-bees and leaf-cutter bees belong to this group. Also written Dasygaster, Dasygastria.

Dasythron (das-i-thrön), n. [NL., < Gr. dasyr, thick, dense, + thron, a lily.] The plants are lily-like, with numerous crowded leaves.] A lilaceous genus of Mexico and adjacent parts of the United States, allied to Facelia, with a dense rosette of rigid, linear, often spinosely toothed leaves, and a tall stem bearing a panicle of small white flowers. There are nearly 20 species, some of which are occasionally cultivated for ornament.

dasytometer (da-sim'e-tër), n. [< Gr. dasyr, thick, dense, + metron, measure.] An instrument designed for testing the density of gases. See manometer.

Dasyornis (das-i-ör'nis), n. [NL. (Vigors and Horsfield, 1826), < Gr. dasyr, shaggy, hairy, + ornus, a bird.] A genus of dextrostral oscine passerine birds of the malurine group, inhabiting Australia, New Zealand, Africa, etc. The species composing the genus as originally proposed are now distributed in the genera Sphenurus and Aegialurus (or Sphenurus).

Dasypterus (das-i-ptë's), n. [NL., < Gr. dasyr, rough, hairy, + ptë, pl. ptëter, child.] Coined by Sundevall in 1873 as an alternative to Phlopterus, this being liable to confusion with Ptilopterus.] Same as Phlopterus.

dasyptidic (das-i-ptë'dik), a. [As Dasypterus + -ic.] Same as phloptidic.

Dasyptilidae (das-i-ptë'ti-dë), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyptilis + -idae.] The Dasyptilidae regarded as a separate family: same as Rhachiodontidae.

Dasyptilina (das-i-ptë'ti-në), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyptilis + -ina.] A subfamily of Colubridae, typified by the genus Dasyptilis, having the body slender, the maxillary teeth few and rudimentary, and the hypapophyses of several vertebrae piercing the throat and capped with enamel, thus forming a series of esophageal teeth. From this remarkable structure the group is also called Rhachiodontidae, after the genus Rhachodon, one of the several synonyms of Dasyptilis. Besides Dasyptilis, the subfamily includes the genus Elachistodon.

Dasyptilis (das-i-ptë'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. dasyr, thick, dense, + ptëla, a light shield.] The typical genus of the family Dasyptilidae. D. scabra is an African species. Also Anodon, Diodon, and Rhachodon (which see).

dasyphyllous (das-i-fil'us), a. [< Gr. dasyr, hairy, + phyllon = L. folium, leaf.] In bot., having woolly or hairy leaves.

Dasyptis (da-sip'i-dë), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Dasyptididae.

dasyptode (das-i-pöd), n. [< Dasyptis (Dasyptode) + -ode.] An animal of the family Dasyptodidae; an armadillo. Also dasyptide.

dasyptodid (da-sip'ö-did), n. An edentate of the family Dasyptodidae.

Dasyptodina (das-i-pö'di-në), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyptis (-pö-) + -ina.] A South American family of loricate edentate quadrupeds; the armadillos. It was formerly continuous with the suborder Loricata of Edentata; it is now, by the exclusion of Tatusiidae and Chlamyphoridae, restricted to the typical armadillos, having the fore toes variously modified and disproportionate in length to one another, the second being the longest, the third, fourth, and fifth variously shortened; the head broad behind; and the ears far apart. There are four subfamilies: Dasyptodina (the encobertinae), Xenarthina (the kabamona), Prionodontina (the kabalonina), and Tolypeutina (the apara). Also Dasyptida.

Dasyptodina (das-i-pö'di-në), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyptis (-pö-) + -ina.] The typical subfamily of the Dasyptodidae, containing the encobert, peludo, etc. They have the anterior and posterior divisions of the carapace well marked: the tail with a conical sheath; the teeth moderate in number (9 or 10 on each side above and below); and the first to the third metacarpal regularly graduated in length, the third being the longest, and the fourth and fifth much shortened. The genera are Dasyptis and Euphractus. See cuts under apara and armadillo.

dasyptodine (da-sip'ö-din), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dasyptodina.

2. n. One of the Dasyptodina, as the peludo, Dasyptis villosus.

Dasyprocta (das-i-prok'tä), n. [NL., < Gr. dasyproctos, with hairy buttocks, < dasyr, hairy, + proctos, the buttocks.] The typical genus of the family Dasyproctidae. It includes the whole of the family except the possums, and is characterized by having only 5 developed toes on the hind feet. It comprehends all the agoutis and the acouchis, as the yellow-rumped agouti (D. agouti), Amer. agouti (D. acouchi), and the acouchi (D. acouchi). D. acouchi inhabits some of the West Indies as well as South America; the other species of the genus are confined to South America. See cuts under acouchi and agouti.

dasyproctid (das-i-prok'tid), n. A rodent of the family Dasyproctidae.

Dasyproctidae (das-i-prok'ti-dë), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyprocta + -idae.] A family of simiiform rodents, of the hystricine series, consisting of the two genera Calomyscus and Dasyprocta.

the former of which contains the pace alone (C. paca), the latter the agoutia. The nails of the feet are hoof-like; the fore feet are 5-toed; the hind feet have also 5 toes (paca), or only 3 (agoutia); the tail is rudimentary or very short; the ears are low; and the upper lip is not cleft. Contrary to the rule in the hystrix series of rodents, the clavicles are rudimentary; and the molar teeth are semi-rooted, and the incisors long. The Dasyproctidae are related to the caracaras and chinchillas (see caracaras and chinchilla); they are confined to the Neotropical region, inhabiting parts of Mexico, some of the West Indies, and the greater part of South America, especially wooded and watered localities. See cuts under agouti and Cotingidae.

Dasypros (das-i-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. dasypros, hairy- or rough-footed; used only as a noun, a hare, rabbit; < dasy, hairy, rough, + pros (rod-) = E. foot.] A genus of armadillos, formerly conterminous with the family Dasyproctidae, now restricted to certain species of the subfamily Dasyproctina (which see). See also cut under armadillo.

Dasyrhamphus (das-i-ram'fus), n. [NL. (Hombon and Jacquinot, 1846), < Gr. dasyr, shaggy, hairy, + rhamphos, beak, snout.] A genus of penguins, of the family Spheniscidae: so called from having the bill extensively feathered. The only species is D. adeliae, of the antarctic seas.

dasytes (das-i-tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. dasytes, hairiness, roughness, < dasy, hairy, rough: see Dasya.] 1. In soil, hairiness; hirsuteness; a growth of hair on some part not usually hairy. — 2. [cop.] In entom., a genus of beetles, of the family Clorida.

dasyure (das-i-ūr), n. [Dasyurus.] An animal of the subfamily Dasyurinae—Thylacine dasyure. See Thylacine and Thylacine, n.—Ursine dasyure, the Tasmanian devil. See Sarcophilus.

Dasyuridae (das-i-ūr-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyurus + -idae.] A family of polyprotodont marsupial mammals. They have 4 incisors in each half of the upper and 3 in each half of the lower jaw; the canines well developed; the hind feet with the clawless hallux small and rudimentary, rarely apposeable; the limbs of proportionate length; the stomach simple; and no coccyx. They are predatory carnivorous or insectivorous marsupials of Australia, Tasmania, New Guinea, and some other islands. They are divided into the two subfamilies Dasyurinae and Myrmecobinae. These animals are sometimes known indifferently as brush-tailed opossums.

Dasyurinae (das-i-ūr-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyurus + -inae.] A subfamily of Dasyuridae; the dasyurines. The tongue is not specially extensible, and the premaxilla and molars are not more than 7 in number; in these respects the subfamily is contrasted with Myrmecobinae (which see). The leading genera are Dasyurus, Sarcophilus, and Thylacine, or the true, the urine, and the thylacine dasyurines, and Phascogale; the last is properly made the type of a different subfamily, Phascogalinae.

dasyurine (das-i-ūr-in), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dasyurinae or Dasyuridae.

Dasyurus (das-i-ūr-us), n. [NL., < Gr. dasy, hairy, rough, + ūr, tail.] The typical genus of the subfamily Dasyurinae, formerly coextensive with the subfamily, now restricted by the exclusion of Thylacine and Sarcophilus. The true dasyurines of the restricted genus mostly inhabit Australia and Tasmania, where they replace the smaller pred-a datary (see dat), lit. a dater (so called because he dates and despatches official documents), prop. adj., relating to dates, < data, datum, a date: see date<sup>1</sup>, n.] An officer of the chancery at Rome, who directly represents the pope in all matters relating to grants, dispensations, etc. All petitions pass through his hands; he has the right of granting benefices not exceeding an annual value of 54 ducats; and with him solely rests the duty of registering and dating all bulls and other documents issued from the Vatican. He is generally a bishop, and is assisted by a subdatary, who is also in holy orders. When a cardinal is elected to the office of datary he bears the title of prædatary. See datary<sup>2</sup>.

datary<sup>2</sup> (dā'tā-ri), n. [= F. daterie = Sp. dataria = It. dataria = Lat. dataria, < ML. dataria, the office or business of a datary, prop. fem. of adj. datarius: see datary<sup>1</sup>.] The office or duty of dating and despatching papal documents; specifically, a branch of the Curia at Rome, established about the end of the thirteenth century by Pope Boniface VIII., for the purpose of dating, registering, and despatching all bulls and documents issued by the pope, examining and reporting upon petitions, etc., and granting favors and dispensations under certain conditions and limitations. See datary<sup>1</sup>.

For riches, besides the temporal dominions, he [Plus V.] hath in all the countries before-named the datary or dispatching of Bulls. Howell, Letters, I. l. 38.

That part of a writing or an inscription which purports to specify the time when, and usually the place where, it was executed. A full date includes the place, day, month, and year; but in some cases the date may consist of only one or two of these particulars, as the year on a coin. In letters the date is inserted to indicate the time when they are written or sent. In deeds, contracts, wills, and other papers, to indicate the time of execution, and usually the time from which they are to take effect on the rights of the parties; but the written date does not exclude evidence of the real time of execution or delivery, and consequent taking effect. In documents the date is usually placed at the end, but may be at the beginning, as it is now generally in letters.

This Deed may bear an elder Date than what you have obtain'd from your Lady. Congreve, Way of the World, v. 12.

2. The time, with more or less particularity, when some event has happened or is to happen: as, the date of a battle; the dates of birth and death on a monument; the date of Easter varies from year to year, or is variable. — 3. Point or period of time in general: as, at that early date. — 4. A season or allotted period of time.

Then ever shall, while dates of times remain,
The heavens thy soul, the earth thy fame contain. Ford, Fame's Memorial.

Your Date of Deliberation, Madam, is expired. Congreve, Way of the World, v. 10.

When your date is over, Peacefully ye fade. R. T. Cook, Daisies.

5. Age; number of years.

Doubled her own, for want of playmates, he . . .
Had lost his ball, and flown his kite, and roll'd His hoop to pleasure Edith. Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

6. Duration; continuance.

Agas of endless date. Milton, P. L., xii. 549
We say that Learning's endless, and blame Fate
For not allowing Life a longer Date. Cowley, Death of Sir Henry Wootton.

7. End; conclusion. [Rare.]

Alberic's Poems (R. E. T. S.), i. 515

Yet hath the longest day his date.
Turning of a Shrove (Child's Ballads, VIII. 185)

What time would spare, from steel receives its date.
Pope, R. of the L., III. 171.

8. A day-book, journal, or diary. Minshaw. — Date certainly, in French law, the date fixed when the instrument has been subjected to the formality of registration, after which the parties to the deed cannot by mutual consent change the date. — Down to date, up to date, to the present time.

So of Solomon in reference to Bahobam, and of every father in reference to every son, up to date. W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 128.

Out of date, no longer in use or in vogue; obsolete; out of season; old-fashioned.

In Parliament his [Burke's] eloquence was out of date. A young generation, which knew him not, had filled the House. Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

No flower girls in the market,
For flowers are out of date. R. H. Stoddard, Persian Songs.

To bear date. See bear<sup>1</sup>. — To make dates, to make appointments. (a) For the performance of a theatrical company. (b) For secret meetings, especially for an immoral purpose; make assignments.

date<sup>2</sup> (dāt), v.; pret. and pp. dated, ppr. dating. [= F. dater = Sp. Pg. datar = It. datare, < ML. datare, note the date, < data, datum, date: see date<sup>1</sup>, n.] 1. To mark with a date, as a letter or other writing. See date<sup>1</sup>, n., 1.

They say that women and music should never be dated. Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, III.

A letter was received from him . . . dated at a small Dutch village on the banks of the Hudson. Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 22.

2. To note or fix the time of, as of an event or transaction; assign a date or time of occurrence to: as, to date an event in ancient history.

I date from this era the corrupt method of education among us. Swift, Modern Education.

3. To have a date: as, the letter dates from Rome. See I., 1.—2. To have beginning; derive origin.

Spotted Dasyure (Dasyurus maculatus).

atory carnivorous quadrupeds of other countries, such as cats and mustelids and viverrines. There are several species. The dental formula is: 4 incisors in each half of the upper and 3 in each half of the lower jaw; 1 canine, 3 premolars, and 4 molars in each half jaw. The vertebral formula is: cervical, 1; dorsal, 12; lumbar, 6; sacral, 2; caudal, 12 or more. The fore feet are 5-toed, but the hallux is absent from the hind feet.

dat, n. An abbreviation of dates.

data, n. Plural of datum.

datable (dā'tā-bl), a. [date<sup>1</sup>, v., + -able.] Capable of being dated. Also spelled dateable.

The earliest datable coins are from Sicily, the varying fortunes of the Sicilian wars making possible certain chronological inferences. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 228.

dateler (dā'tā-lēr), n. [E. dial., also written dateller: see dayteller.] Same as dayteller.

date-mark (dāt'mārk), n. A special mark stamped on an article of gold or silver to indicate the year of manufacture. Thus, in the London Goldsmiths' Company, during the twenty years from 1866 to 1875 this mark was a letter of the alphabet in small Old English character, for the next twenty years, beginning in 1876 and ending in 1895, Roman capitals were adopted.

date-palm (dāt'pām'), n. The common name of Phoenix dactylifera, the palm-tree of Scripture; also called date-tree. Next to the coconut tree, the date is unquestionably the most interesting and useful of the palm tribe. As with the coconut tree, nearly every part is applied to some useful purpose, and the fruit not only affords the principal food of the inhabitants of various countries, but is a source of a large part of their traffic. It is cultivated in immense numbers all over the north-eastern part of Africa as well as in south-western Asia, and is found throughout southern Europe, though rarely productive there. Its stem shoots up to the height of from 60 to 80 feet with out-branching divisions, and is of nearly the same thick-ness throughout its length. From the summit it throws out a magnificent crown of large feathery-shaped leaves, and a number of spadices, each of which in the female plant bears a bunch of from 120 to 200 dates, each bunch weighing from 20 to 35 pounds. The fruit is eaten fresh or dried. The best dates of commerce are obtained from the coasts of the Persian gulf, where the tree is cultivated with great care, and where over 100 varieties are known. The date-palm was probably originally derived from the wild date-palm, P. sylvestris, which is found throughout India, and is planted very extensively in Bengal, chiefly for the production of toddy and sugar. See Phoenix.

Date-palm (Phoenix dactylifera)

date-plum (dāt'plūm), n. A name for the edible fruit of several species of the genus Diospyros, and also for the trees. See Diospyros.

date-plum (dāt'plūm), n. A name for the edible fruit of several species of the genus Diospyros, and also for the trees. See Diospyros.

dater (dāt'tēr), n. 1. One who dates.—2. A datary. See datary.

Datary [F.] a dater of writings, and (more particularly) the dater or despatcher of the Pope's bulls. Colgrave.

date-shell (dāt'shel), n. [date + shell.] A mussel-shell of the stone-boring genus Lithodomus (or Lithophagus), of the family Mytilidae,

Date-shell (Lithodomus lithophagus) as the Mediterranean L. dactylus, abounding in the subaqueous columns of the temple of Serapis at Pozzuoli, near Naples: so called from its shape or appearance. See Lithodomus.

date-sugar (dāt'shūg'ār), n. Sugar produced from the sap of the date-palm, and from some other species of the same genus.

date-tree (dāt'trē), n. The date-palm.

The date-trees of El-Medinah merit their celebrity. Their stately columnar stems here seem higher than in other lands, and their lower fronds are allowed to tremble in the breeze without mutilation.

R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 265.

date-wine (dāt'wīn), n. The fermented sap of the date-palm.

datolite (dath'ō-līt), n. See datolite.
datōn (dā'shōn), n. [L. dato(n), dare, pp. datus, give: see date<sup>1</sup>, date<sup>2</sup>.] In civil law, the act of giving: as, the datōn of an office: distinguished from donation or gift in that it does not imply beneficence or liberality in the giver.

da trarsi (dā trā'si), [It. to be drawn out: da, < L. de, of (to); trarsi, < F. tirer, draw; si, < L. se, refl. pron., itself, themselves: see tear<sup>1</sup> and se.] In music, when following the name of instruments, a term denoting that they are furnished with slides: as, trombi da trarsi, corni da trarsi, trumpets or horns with slides.

Datiscia (dā-tis'kī), n. [NL.] A genus of exogenous herbs, type of the order Dalmanaceae. It includes two species, one of which is found in southern California, and the other, D. canabina, an herbaceous dioecious perennial, is a native of the southern parts of Europe, where it is used as a substitute for Persian bark, as a yellow dye, and in the manufacture of cordage.

Datiscoaceae (dat-is-kā'sē-sē), n. pl. [NL., < Datura + -aceae.] A small natural order of plants, with apetalous flowers, but having closer affinities with the Cucurbitaceae and Begoniaceae than with any of the apetalous orders, and united by Baillon with the Saxifragaceae. There are only three genera, of which Datura is the best-known.

datiscin (dā-tis'in), n. [Datisca + -in.] A substance (C<sub>21</sub>H<sub>35</sub>O<sub>19</sub>) having the appearance of grape-sugar, first extracted by Braconnot from the leaves of Datisca cannabina. It has been used as a yellow dye.

datist (dā-tis't), n. The mnemonic name given by Petrus Hispanus to that mood of the third figure of syllogism in which the major premise is universal and affirmative, and the minor premise and conclusion are particular and affirmative. These distinctions of quantity and quality are indicated by the vowels of the word, a i i. The letter s after the second vowel shows that the mood is reduced to direct reasoning by the simple conversion of the minor, and the initial d shows that the resulting mood is darii. The following is an example of a syllogism in datist: All men irrationally prejudiced have weak minds; but some men irrationally prejudiced are learned, hence, some learned men have weak minds.

dativ (dā'tiv), a. and n. [= F. datif = Pr. datiu = Sp. Pg. It. dativo = D. datif = G. Dan. Sw. dativ, < L. datus, of or belonging to giving (in lit. sense, apart from grammar, first in L.L.); census daturus (tr. Gr. πρὸς δότην), or simply daturus, the dativ case; < datus, pp. of dare, give: see date<sup>1</sup>, date<sup>2</sup>.] 1. a. i. In gram., noting one of the cases of nouns and pronouns and adjectives in Indo-European languages, and in some others, used most commonly to denote the indirect or remoter object of the action of a verb, that to or for which anything is done. This case is found in all the ancient languages of our family, and is widely preserved even among the later. Though nowhere distinguished in form from the accusative or objective in modern English, it is really present in such expressions as, give him his due, show this man the way, and him, whom, them, and (in part) her are historically datives, retaining a dativ termination. The precise value of the original Indo-European dativ is a matter of doubt and dispute. Abbreviated dat.

2. In law: (a) Noting that which may be given or disposed of at pleasure; being in one's gift. (b) Removable, in distinction from perpetual. said of an officer. (c) Given or appointed by a magistrate or a court of justice, in distinction from what is given by law or by a testator: as, an executor dativ in Scots law (equivalent to an administrator).—Decree dativ, executor dativ. See decree, executor.

II. n. The dativ case. See I., 1.—Ethical dativ. See ethical.

datively (dā'tiv-ē), adv. In the manner of the dativ case; as a dativ.

The pronoun of the first or second person, used datively.
The Century, XXXII, 896

datolite (dat'ō-līt), n. [So called from its tendency to divide into granular portions; < Gr. δατολίτης, divide, + λίθος, stone.] A borosilicate of calcium, occurring most commonly in brilliant glassy crystals, which are colorless or of a pale-green tint, white, grayish, or red; also in a white, opaque, massive form, looking like porcelain, and in radiated columnar form with botryoidal surface (the variety botryolite). It is found in Norway, the Tyrol, and Italy, and in fine crystals in New Jersey, Connecticut, and the Lake Superior mining-region. Baytownite is a pseudomorph of chalcocite after datolite. Also datholite, humboldtite.

dattock (dat'ōk), n. The wood of a leguminous tree of western Africa, Detarium Senegalense. It is hard and dense, and resembles mahogany in color.

datum (dā'tum), n.; pl. data (-tā). [L. datum, a gift, present, ML. also an allowance, concession, tribute (also in fem. data), prop. neut. of datus, pp. of dare, give: see date<sup>1</sup>, date<sup>2</sup>.] 1. A fact given; originally, one of the quantities stated, or one of the geometrical figures supposed constructed, in a mathematical problem, and from which the required magnitude or figure is to be determined. But Euclid uses the corresponding Greek term (δοθέν) in a second sense, as meaning any magnitude or figure which we know how to determine. 2. A fact either indubitably known or treated as such for the purposes of a particular discussion; a premise.—3. A position of reference, by which other positions are defined.

As a general datum, in philosophical chronology, Cumberland came about a century after Bacon, and about ninety years before Adam Smith.
Biographical Memoirs, XLIII, 228.

Data of consciousness, the original convictions of the mind; propositions that must be believed but cannot be proved.

Many philosophers have attempted to establish on the principles of common sense propositions which are not original data of consciousness; while the original data of consciousness, from which their propositions were derived, and to which they owed their whole necessity and truth—these data the same philosophers were (strange to say) not disposed to admit.
Sir W. Hamilton.

Datum-line, in engine, and surveying, the base-line of a section, from which all the heights and depths are measured in the plans of a railway, etc.

datum-plane (dā'tum-plān), n. In oraniom., a given horizontal plane from which measurements of skulls proceed, or to which the dimensions of skulls are referred.

The horizontal datum-plane adopted by German cran-iologists.
Science, V, 422.

Datura (dā-tū'rā), n. [NL., < Hind. dhatūrā, a plant (Datura fastuosa).] A genus of solana-

Thorn apple (Datura stramonium), with cross-section of seed-vessel.

ceous plants, with angular-toothed leaves, large funnel-shaped flowers, and prickly, globular, 4-valved pods. There are several species, all of them possessing poisonous properties and a disagreeable odor. D. stramonium is the thorn-apple, all parts of which have strong narcotic properties. It is sometimes employed as a remedy for neuralgia, convulsions, etc., and the leaves and root are smoked for asthma. The plant is supposed to be a native of western Asia, but is now found as a weed of cultivation in almost all the temperate and warmer regions of the globe. In some parts of the United States it is called the jimson (which see). D. fastuosa and D. Metel of India possess qualities similar to D. stramonium. D. arborea, also known as Brugmansia suaveolens, a native of South America, is a shrubby plant with very large fragrant white blossoms, and is sometimes found in greenhouses.

daturine (dā-tū'rīn), n. [Datura + -ine.] A poisonous alkaloid found in the thorn-apple. See Datura. Same as atropin.

daub (dāb), v. t. [Also formerly dawb, < ME. dauben, dawben, < OF. dauber, whiten, whitewash, also, in deflected senses, furnish, also (with var. dober) beat, swing, plaster, < L. dealbare, whiten, whitewash, plaster, parge, LL. also purify (see dealbate), < de (intensive) + albare, whiten, < albus, white; cf. daub = alb, < L. alba. The resemblance to Celtic forms seems to be accidental: W. dwb = Ir. dob = Gael. dob, plaster; W. dwbio = Ir. dobam = Gael. **dob*, v., plaster. Cf. adob.] 1. To smear with soft adhesive matter; plaster; cover or coat with mud, slime, or other soft substance.

She took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch.
Ex ii, 3

As will I break down the wall that ye have daubed with untempered mortar.
Isaiah xlii, 14.

2. To soil; defile; besmear.

Multitudes of horses and other cattle that are always daubing the streets.
B. Mandeville, Fable of the Bees, Pref.

He's honest, though daubed with the dust of the mill.
A. Cunningham, The Miller.

Hence—3. To paint ignorantly, coarsely, or badly.

If a picture is daubed with many bright colours, the vulgar admire it.
Watts.

4. To give a specious appearance to; patch up; disguise; conceal.

So smooth he daub'd his vice with show of virtue.
Shak., Rich. III, iii, 5.

Faith is necessary to the susception of baptism; and themselves confess it, by striving to find out new kinds of faith to daub the matter up.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II, 394.

She is all Truth, and hates the lying, masking, daubing World, as I do.
Wycherley, Plain Dealer, I, 1.

5. To dress or adorn without taste; deck vulgarly or ostentatiously; load as with finery.

Yet since princes will have such things, it is better they should be graced with elegance than daubed with cost.
Bacon, Essays.

Let him be daub'd with lace.
Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires.

daub (dāb), n. [daub, v.] 1. A cheap kind of mortar; plaster made of mud.

A square house of wattle and daub.
D. Livingston, Missionary Travels (ed. 1838), p. 408.

2. A viscous, adhesive application; a smear.—3. A daubing or smearing stroke. [Scottish.]

Many a time have I gotten a wipe with a towel; but never a daub with a dishcloth before.
Scottish proverb.

4. A coarse, inartistic painting.

Did you stop in to take a look at the grand picture on your way back?—The a melancholy daub, my lord!
Burns, Tristram Shandy, III. 12.

Daubentonia (dā-ben-tō-nī-ā), n. [NL., named after the distinguished French naturalist L. J. Daubenton (1716–1800), noted as a collaborator of Buffon.] The proper name of the genus more commonly called Chromys (which see), containing the eye-eye, D. madagascariensis, and having priority over the others. See out under eye-eye.

Daubentoniidae (dā-ben-tō-nī-i-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Daubentonia + -idae.] A family of prosimians, typified by the genus Daubentonia; generally called Chromyidae (which see).

Daubentonioides (dā-ben-tō-nī-oi-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Daubentonia + -oides.] A superfamily of lemuroids or prosimians, distinguished by the gliriform incisors and want of canines in the adult; the Daubentoniidae considered as a suborder. Gill, 1872.

dauber (dā-bēr), n. One who or that which daubs. Specifically—(a) One who builds walls with clay or mud mixed with straw.

I am a younger brother, . . . of mean parentage, a dirt dauber's son; am I therefore to be blamed?
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 230.

(b) A coarse, ignorant painter.

But how should any sign-post dauber know
The worth of Tiddon or of Angelo?
Dryden, Epistle IV., To Mr. Lee.

(c) A low and gross flatterer. (d) A copperplate-printer's pad, consisting of rags firmly tied together and covered over with a piece of canvas, for inking plates. (e) A mud-wasp: from the way in which it daubs mud in building its nest. (f) The brush used to spread blacking upon shoes, as distinguished from the polisher, or brush used for polishing; they are sometimes combined in one.

daubery (dā-bēr-i), n. [Also formerly daubry, daubry; < daub + -ery.] 1. A daubing.—2t. A crudely artful device.

She works by charms, by spells, by the figure, and such daubery as this is.
Shak., M. W. of W., IV. 2.

daubing (dā-bing), n. [Verbal n. of daub, v.] 1. Something which is applied by daubing, especially plaster or mortar; specifically, in recent use, a rough coat of mortar applied to a wall to give it the appearance of stone. See chinking, 1.

Lo, when the wall is fallen, shall it not be said unto you, Where is the daubing wherewith ye have daubed it?
Ezek. xiii. 12.

2. The process of forming walls by means of hardened earth: extensively employed in the sixteenth century.—3. A mixture of tallow and oil used to soften leather and render it more or less water-proof.—4. Coarse, inartistic painting.

She is still most splendidly, gallantly ugly, and looks like an ill Piece of Daubing in a rich Frame.
Wycherley, Plain Dealer, II. 1.

5. Gross flattery. Bp. Burnet.

My Lord, if you examine it over again, it is far from being a gross piece of daubing, as some dedications are.
Burns, Tristram Shandy, I. 9.

daubreilite (dā-brē-īlīt), n. [See daubreite.] Native chromium sesquisulphid, a rare mineral known to occur only in certain meteoric irons. It has a black color, metallic luster, and is associated with troilite.

daubreite (dā-brē-īt), n. [After the French mineralogist G. A. Daubrée (born 1814).] Native bismuth oxichlorid, occurring in compact or earthy masses of a yellowish color in Chili.

daubry, n. An obsolete form of daubery.

dauby (dā-bī), a. [< daub + -y.] 1. Viscous; glutinous; slimy; adhesive.

And therefore not vain th' industrious kind
With dauby wax and flow'r the chimks have lin'd.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, IV. 54.

2. Made by daubing; appearing like a daub: as, a dauby picture.

Daucus (dā-kus), n. [NL., < L. daucus, daucum, < Gr. daikon, also, neut. daucos, a plant of the carrot kind, growing in Crete. See daube.] A genus of umbelliferous plants, roughly hispid, with finely divided leaves and small ovate or oblong fruit covered with barbed prickles. There are about 30 species belonging to the northern temperate regions of the old world, and one indigenous in America. The only important species is the cultivated carrot, D. Carota, which is also widely naturalized as a noxious weed. See carrot. See out in next column.

Kennedy, The Poet's Wish.

dawtle, dawty (dā-tl), n. [So, dim. from dawt.] A beloved child; a darling; a child much fondled through affection: frequently used as a term of endearment.

It's ten to one ye're nse their dawty.
Shirreff, Poems, p. 333.

day (dā), n. [Early mod. E. also days, dale; < M.E. day, dai, del, dage, dawe, dage, etc., < A.S. dag, pl. dagas, = OS. dag = OFries. dei, di = MLG. dach, LG. dag = D. dag = OHG. tag, MHG. tag, G. tag = Icel. dagr = Sw. Dan. dag = Goth. dags, day; akin to A.S. (post.) dāgor = Icel. dāgr, day. Possibly ult. < *Ind.-Eur. √ *dhagh, Skt. √ dah, burn*. Not connected with L. dies, day (see dial). Hence daw and dawn.] 1. The period during which the sun is above the horizon, or shines continuously on any given portion of the earth's surface; the interval of light, in contradistinction to that of darkness, or to night; the period between the rising and the setting of the sun, of varying length, and called by astronomers the artificial day.

And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night.
Gen. i. 5.

And always, night and day, he was in the mountains.
Mark v. 5.

It was the middle of the day.
Ever the weary wind went on.
Tennyson, Dying Swan.

Hence—2. Light; sunshine.

Let us walk honestly, as in the day.
Rom. xiii. 13.

It is directly in your way, we have day enough to perform our journey, and, as you like your entertainment, you may there repose yourself a day or two.

Cotton, in Walton's Angler, ii. 235.

While the day,
Descending, struck athwart the hall, and shot
A flying splendour out of brass and steel.
Tennyson, Princess, vi.

3. The whole time or period of one revolution of the earth on its axis, or the space of twenty-four hours; specifically, the interval of time which elapses between two consecutive returns of the same terrestrial meridian to the sun. In this latter specific sense it is called the natural, solar, or astronomical day. Since the length of this day is continually varying, owing to the eccentricity of the earth's orbit and the obliquity of the ecliptic, a mean solar day (the civil day) is employed, which is the average period of one revolution of the earth on its axis relative to the sun's position considered as fixed. The day of twenty-four hours may be reckoned from noon to noon, as in the astronomical or nautical day, or from midnight to midnight, as in the civil day recognized in the United States, throughout the British empire, and in most of the countries of Europe. The Babylonians reckoned the civil day from sunrise to sunrise; the Umbrians, from noon to noon; the Athenians and Hebrews, from sunset to sunset; and the Romans, from midnight to midnight.

And the evening and the morning were the first day.
Gen. i. 5.

My lord, I cannot be so soon provided;
Please you, deliberate a day or two.
Shak., T. G. of V., i. 2.

4. A particular or regularly recurring period of twenty-four hours, assigned to the doing of some specified thing, or connected with some event or observance: as, settling-day; bill-day.

Knip's maid comes to me, to tell me that the women's day at the playhouse is to-day, and that therefore I must be there, to encrease their profit.
Pope, Diary, IV. 23. Specifically—(a) An anniversary; the particular day on which some event is commemorated: as, St. Bartholomew's day; a birthday; New Year's day. (b) The regularly recurring period in each week set apart for some particular purpose, as for receiving calls, etc.

Mr. Gayman, your servant; you'll be at my Aunt Susan's this afternoon; 'tis her day, you know.

Southern, Maid's Last Prayer, i.

You have been at my Lady Whiff's upon her day, Madam?

Congress, Double-Dealer, iii. 3.

Ladies, however, have their days, and afternoon tea is as much an institution in Australia as at home.

Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 75.

5. Time. (a) Specified interval or space of time: as, three years' day to do something; he was absent for a year's day. (b) Time to pay; credit. [Time is now used in this sense.]

Faith, then, I'll pray you, 'cause he is my neighbour,
To take a hundred pound, and give him day.
B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, iv. 1.

(c) Period of time.

At twenty-one, in a day of gloom and terror, he was placed at the head of the administration.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

(d) Appointed time; set period; appointment.

After long waiting, & large expenses, though he kept no day with them, yet he came at length & took them in, in y night.

Bradford, Flymouth Plantation, p. 12.

If my debtors do not keep their day.
Dryden.

(e) Definite time of existence, activity, or influence; allotted or actual term of life, usefulness, or glory: as, his day is over.

The cat will mew, and dog will have his day.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 1.

Lady Shrew. Why, truly, Mrs. Clackitt has a very pretty talent, and a great deal of industry.
Shak., True, madam, and has been tolerably successful in her day.
Shirreff, School for Scandal, i. 1.

Our little systems have their day:
They have their day and cease to be.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, Prol.

(f) A time or period, as distinguished from other times or periods; ago: commonly used in the plural: as, bygone days; the days of our fathers.

Much cruelty did the Patavines suffer in this mans dates.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 158.

de (dē), n. [Also written dee, < ME. de, < AS. de, < L. de, the name of the fourth letter, < d, its proper sound, + -e, a vowel used with consonants to assist their utterance.] The fourth letter of the Latin and English alphabets. It is rarely spelled out, being usually represented by the simple character. See D, 1.

de<sup>3</sup>, prep. [(1) ME. de, < OF. de, F. de = Sp. Pg. de = It. di, < L. de, from, of, etc.: see de.] (2) [L. de: see de.] 1. A French preposition, found in English only in some French phrases, as couleur de rose, or in proper names, as in Simon de Montfort, Cœur de Lion, De Vere, etc., either of Middle English origin, or modern and mere French. Its use in such names, following the name proper, and preceding what was originally, in most cases, the name of an estate, led to its acceptance as evidence of noble or gentle descent, corresponding in this to the German von and the Dutch van. But as the particle in proper names often originated without any such implication, and has also been often assumed without authority, it is in itself of no value as an evidence.

2. A Latin preposition, meaning 'from' or 'of,' occurring in certain phrases often used in English: as, de novo, anew; de facto, of fact; de jure, of right.

de- [(1) ME. de, < OF. de, often written des, def, F. de, de- = Sp. Pg. de = It. di, < L. de, prefix, de, prep., from, away from, down from, out of, of, etc. (2) ME. de, def, < OF. def, deo, de-, mod. F. de, < L. de-, dis: see de-, dif-. 1. A verb-prefix of Latin origin, expressing in Latin, and hence with modifications in modern speech, various phases of the original meaning 'from, away from, down from.' (1) Separative, denoting departure or removal—'off, from off, away, down, out,' or cessation or removal of the fundamental idea—de-privative, equivalent to ex- or dis- privative. (2) 'Completing'—'through out to the end,' etc. (3) Intensive: a force often lost in English. (See examples following.) In some words the separative or privative force of this prefix is felt in English, as in de-compose, de-mote, being in such meaning often used as an English prefix (de-privative), as in deconstructive, de-Saonise, derail, etc. It is less distinctly felt in words like depress, devalue, etc.; and in many words, where it has in Latin the completive or intensive force, its force is not felt in English, as in deride, denote, etc.

2. In some words a reduced form of the original Latin prefix dis-, Latin dis- and dis- being in Old French and Middle English more or less merged in form and meaning (see dis-). See defer, deface, defame, decoy, etc.

de- A form of -di-, -di-, or -di-, -di- in older English, as in aid, felde, felde, etc., now extant only in made, the (contracted) preterit and past participle of make. See -di-, -di-.

deab. A kind of dog, the ekia (which see). deacidification (dē'a-sid'i-f-kā'shon), n. [de-priv. + acidification.] The removal or neutralization of an acid or of acidity.

deacon (dē'kn), n. [Early mod. E. also deken; < ME. deken, deken, decon, deacon, diakon, deakne, < AS. deodcon, deacon = D. deken, diakon = MLG. diakon = G. diakon, diakon = Icel. dyakon, dyakon, a deacon, = Dan. degn, a parish clerk, = Sw. dekan, a scholar (Dan. Sw. diakon, deacon), = OF. diacne, diacne, F. diacre = Pr. diacre, diague = Sp. diacno = Pg. diacno, < LL. diaconus = Goth. diakon, a deacon, < Gr. diakonos, a servant, waitingman, messenger, eccles. a deacon; of uncertain origin; perhaps related to deceus, pursue, cause to run. The Teut. forms appear to have been in part confused with the forms belonging to L. decanus, a dean (see dean), and with those belonging to G. degen, etc., AS. degn, E. thane (see thane).] 1. Eccl., one of a body of men, either forming an order of the ministry or serving merely as elected officers of individual churches, whose chief duty is to assist a presbyter, priest, or other clergyman, especially in administering the eucharist and in the care of the poor. (a) In the apostolic church, one of an order of ministers or church-officers, inferior to apostles and presbyters, whose duty it was to serve at the Lord's Supper, or as a deacon, to minister to the poor. It is generally believed that the institution of this office is recorded in Acts vi. 1-6, where, although the word deacon (diakonos, minister) is not used of the seven persons appointed, the corresponding words "to minister or serve" (diakonein) and "ministration" (diakonia) are employed. By an analogy with the Moslem hierarchy, St. Clement of Rome in the apostolic age called the deacons Levites, and this use of the word Levite long remained frequent. (b) In the early Christian church, one of the third order of the ministry, of lower rank than bishops and presbyters. The deacons applied complete unction to men in preparation for baptism, but anointed women on the forehead only, assisted the celebrant at the eucharist, read the gospel and made proclamations during the liturgy, maintained order in the congregation, and cared for the poor and sick. Those attached to episcopal sees acted as the bishop's adjutants, messengers, and representatives, and when belonging to a great patriarchal or metropolitan see possessed much influence. Hence—(c) In the Greek Church, one of the third order of the ministry, similar in rank and duties to the office of the same name in the early church. (d) In the Roman Catholic Church, a member of the third order of the ministry. He assists the priest throughout the celebration of the eucharist or mass, and reads the gospel. The principal assistant to the celebrant at a solemn celebration is called the deacon, and vested accordingly, whether in deacon's, priest's, or bishop's orders. (e) In the Anglican Church, a member of the third order of the ministry. His duties are to assist the priest in divine service, especially at the holy communion, help in distributing the elements to the people, read the Scriptures, especially the eucharistic gospel, catechize, baptize infants in the absence of the priest, preach if licensed by the bishop, and seek out the sick and poor and make their wants known to the curate. Deacons cannot consecrate the eucharist, pronounce absolution, or give benediction. The bishop, priest, or deacon who acts as principal assistant at the holy communion is called the deacon or compter. (f) In the Methodist Episcopal Church, a member of an order of the ministry next below that of elder. The deacons are elected by the annual conference, are ordained by the bishop, and are authorized to assist in the administration of the eucharist, to administer the rites of baptism and marriage, and to perform the duties of a traveling preacher. (g) In the Baptist and Congregational churches, one of two or more officers elected by each church to distribute the elements in the communion after they have been consecrated by the minister, and to act as the advisers of the pastor and as the almoners of the charities of the church. (h) In the Presbyterian Church, one of a number of officers elected by a congregation and ordained by the minister to assist the session in the care of the poor and in the general management of the secular affairs of the church. Deacons are not always appointed, their place being sometimes supplied by the elders. (i) In the Lutheran Church in the United States, one of a number of laymen chosen to attend to the charities and temporalities of a congregation. With an equal number of elders and the pastor, the deacons constitute the council of each church to manage its temporal and spiritual affairs. (j) In the Mormon Church, a subordinate official who acts as an assistant to the teacher, but has no authority to baptize or administer the sacrament. Mormon Cyclopedia, xvii.

2. In Scotland, the president of an incorporated trade, who is the chairman of its meetings and signs its records. Before the passing of the Burgh Reform Act the deacons of the crafts or incorporated trades in royal burghs formed a constituent part of the town council, and were understood to represent the trades, as distinguished from the merchants and guild brethren. The deacon-convenor of the trade in Edinburgh and Glasgow still continues to be a constituent member of the town council.

3. [Allusion not clear.] A green salted hide or skin weighing less than 8 pounds.—Cardinal deacon. See cardinal.—Deacons' seat, in New England, a pew formerly made in the front of the pulpit for deacons to occupy.—Regent deacon, in the early church, a deacon attached to one of the seven ecclesiastical regions into which Rome was divided from very early times. There was one deacon for each region.

deacon (dē'kn), v. t. [deacon, n.] 1. To make or ordain deacon.—2. To read out, as a line of a psalm or hymn, before singing it; sometimes with off: from an ancient custom of reading the hymn one or two lines at a time, the congregation singing the lines as read. This office was frequently performed by a deacon. The custom is nearly as old as the Reformation, and was made necessary by the lack of hymn-books when congregational singing was introduced. See live, v. t.

A prayer was made, and the chorister deaconed the first two lines. Goodrich, Reminiscences, I. 77.

3. To arrange so as to present a specious and attractive appearance; present the best and largest specimens (of fruit or vegetables) to view and conceal the defective ones: as, to deacon strawberries or apples. [Slang, U. S.] [This sense contains a humorous allusion to the thrifty habits ascribed to the rural New England deacons.] Hence—4. To sophisticate; adulterate; "doctor": as, to deacon wine or other liquor. [Slang.]—Deaconed veal, veal unfit for use, as when killed too young. [Connecticut.]

deaconess (dē'kn-ēs), n. [Formerly also deaconise; = D. diakoness = G. diakonissa = Dan. diakonisse = F. diakonisse, diakonisse = Sp. Pg. diaconisa = It. diaconessa, < ML. diaconissa, fem. of diaconus, deacon: see deacon and -ess.] 1. One of an ecclesiastical order of women in the early church, who discharged for members of their own sex those parts of the diaconal office which could not conveniently or fitly be performed by men. They acted as doorkkeepers and kept order on the women's side of the congregation, assisted at the baptism of women and administered the unction before baptism except the anointing of the forehead, instructed female catechumens, took charge of sick and poor women, and were present at interviews of the clergy with women. Such an order was especially needed in those Christian countries where Oriental seclusion of women prevailed. Deaconesses were required to remain unmarried, and were generally selected from the consecrated virgins or from the order of widows. In the Eastern Church the order continued into the middle ages, but it is not certain when it became extinct. In the Western Church it was abolished by successive decrees of council during the sixth and succeeding centuries, and became finally extinct about the tenth. Abbesses were sometimes called deaconesses after the order became obsolete.

And Rom. xvi. I commend unto you Phoebe, the deaconess of the church of Cenchrea. Tyndale, Works, p. 250.

2. No Epiphanius: There is an order of deaconesses in the church, but not to meddle, or to attempt any of the holy offices. Jer. Taylor, Office Ministerial.

3. A member of an order of women more or less fully established in recent times in several Protestant churches, with duties similar to the preceding; also, a member of the Institution of Deaconesses first established by Pastor Fliedner, of the United Evangelical Church of Prussia, at Kaiserswerth in 1838. The latter are wholly devoted, by engagements for fixed periods to charitable work, as the nursing of the sick, etc. They reside in separate houses, which have been established in many parts of the world.

deaconhood (dē'kn-hūd), n. [deacon + -hood.]

1. The office or ministry of a deacon; deaconship.—2. A body of deacons taken collectively. deaconry (dē'kn-ri), n. [deacon + -ry.] Deaconship.

The deacons of all these churches should make up a common deaconry, and be deacons in common unto all these churches in an ordinary way, as the other elders. Goodwin, Works, IV. iv. 128.

deacon-seat (dē'kn-sēt), n. A long settee used by lumbermen in camp. It is hewn from a single log, is usually a foot wide and five or six inches thick, and is raised about eighteen inches from the floor. [U. S. and Canada.]

deaconship (dē'kn-ship), n. [deacon + -ship.] The office, dignity, or ministry of a deacon or deaconess.

Even the apostle himself [was] called a deaconship. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1885), II. 21.

dead (ded), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also ded; < ME. ded, dead, dead, dyad, < AS. deadd = OE. ddd = OFries. ddd, ddd = MD. d. dood = MLG. ddd, ddd, LG. ddd = OHG. MHG. dd, G. tot, tot = Dan. ddd = Sw. ddd = Icel. deudr = Goth. daute, dead; orig. a pp. (with suffix -d, -d, etc.: see -ed and -d) of the strong verb represented by Goth. **dauan* (pret. **dau*, pp. **dauan*) = Icel. deyja (pret. dó, pp. dáttan), dis: see die. Dead is thus nearly equiv. to diad, pp. of die. Cf. death.] 1. a. 1. times dead man's part.

dead-spindle (ded'spin'dil), n. The spindle in the tail-stock or dead-head of a lathe, which does not rotate.

dead-stroke (ded'strök), n. Delivering a blow without recoil: as, a dead-stroke hammer. See drop-process.

dead-thraw (ded'thrä), n. [Scotch form of death-throe.] The death-throe.

Who ever heard of a door being barred when a man was in the dead-thraw? How d'ye think the spirit was to get awa through bolts and bars like these?

Scott, Guy Mannering, xvii.

dead-tongue (ded'tung), n. The water-hemlock, Eleutherococcus: so called from its paralyzing effects upon the organs of speech.

dead-water (ded'wä'tär), n. Naut., the water which eddies about a ship's stern during her progress. Also called eddy-water.

dead-weight (ded'wät), n. 1. A heavy or oppressive burden; a weight or burden that has to be borne without aid or without compensatory advantage.

The fact is, fine thoughts, enshrined in appropriate language, are dead-weights upon the stage, unless they are struck like sparks from the action of the fable.

Cornhill Mag.

The gentleness of Nature's growths or motions will, in time, burst asunder or wear away the proudest dead-weight man can heap upon them.

W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 42.

2. A name given to an advance by the Bank of England to the government on account of half-pay and pensions to retired officers of the army and navy.—3. Naut., the lading of a vessel when it consists of heavy goods; that part of the cargo, as coal, iron, etc., which pays freight according to its weight, and not to its bulk.

dead-well (ded'wel), n. Same as absorbing-well. See absorb.

dead-wind (ded'wind), n. Naut., an old term for a wind dead ahead, or blowing directly from the point toward which a ship is sailing.

dead-wood (ded'wüd), n. 1. In shipbuilding, a body of timber built up on top of the keel at either end, to afford a firm fastening for the cant timbers.—2. A buffer-block.—3. In ten-pins and pin-pool, the pins which have been knocked down. Hence—4. Useless material.

The commissioner [of patents] has made some effort—though not so strenuous as might be—to cut the dead-wood out of the examining and clerical forces left him as a legacy by his predecessor.

See Ames, N. S., LVII 202.

To get the dead-wood on one, to have one entirely at a disadvantage or in one's power; secure advantage over one. [U. S. slang.]

dead-wool (ded'wül), n. Wool taken from the skins of sheep which have been slaughtered or have died.

dead-work (ded'wërk), n. Work which is in itself unprofitable, but is necessary to, and leads up to, that which is profitable or productive; specifically, in mining, that work which is done in the way of opening a mine, or preparing to remove the ore in a mine, but is not accompanied by any production of ore, or is almost non-remunerative.

To describe dead-work is to narrate all those portions of our work which consume the most time, give the most trouble, require the greatest patience and endurance, and seem to produce the most insignificant results.

Science, VI 174.

dead-works (ded'wërks), n. pl. Naut., the parts of a ship which are above the surface of the water when she is balanced for a voyage: now generally called upper works.

de-aérate (dë-ä'të-rät), v. t.; pret. and pp. de-aé-rated, pp. de-aé-rating. [de-priv. + aérate.] To expel the air from; free from air. [Rare.]

Dr. Mayer states that the gases employed in this research were obtained from the coals by introducing two to four hundred grains into a flask, which was immediately filled up with hot de-aé-rated water.

Ure, Dict., IV. 240.

deaf (def or däf), a. [Early mod. E. also deaf; ME. def, deaf, deft, deaf, etc., AS. def = OE. def = OFries. def = D. deaf = MLG. def, LG. def = *OHG. 3. In erok., to render impervious to sound (as a door or a partition) by means of sound-boarding or pugging.

deafening (def'n-ing), n. In erok., the pugging used to prevent the passage of sound through floors, partitions, and the like. Also called sound-boarding.

deafy (def'li), adv. Without sense of sounds; obscurely heard.

deaf-mute (def'müt), n. [deaf + mute.] 1.

A person who is both deaf and dumb, the dumbness resulting from deafness which has existed either from birth or from a very early period of the person's life. Deaf-mutes communicate their thoughts by means either of significant or arbitrary signs or motions, or of a manual alphabet formed by positions of the fingers of one or both hands. The accompanying illustration shows a form of the single-hand alphabet now universally taught to deaf-mutes in the United States.

The two-hand alphabet, invented about the close of the eighteenth century, is somewhat more complicated, and is in limited use in other countries. Deaf-mutes are taught in many cases to understand spoken language by observing the motions of the speaker's lips, and to use articulate speech themselves, sometimes very distinctly.

Manual Alphabet for Deaf-mutes

2. A subject for dissection. [Med. slang.] deaf-muteness (def'müt'nes), n. [deaf-mute + -ness.] Deaf-dumbness.

Physiological accidents, more painful and not less incurable than those of deaf-muteness and blindness.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 252.

deaf-mutism (def'müt'izm), n. [deaf-mute + -ism.] The condition of being a deaf-mute.

Deaf-mutism may give no actual indication of disease, though the organ of hearing itself is, probably, always defective and of imperfect development.

B. W. Richardson, Prevent. Med., p. 194.

deafness (def'nes), n. [ME. defnes, deaf, deaf + -ness.] 1. Incapacity of perceiving or distinguishing sounds, in consequence of the impairment of the organs of hearing; that state of the organs which prevents the reception of the impressions that constitute hearing; want of the sense of hearing. Deafness occurs in every degree, from that which merely impairs the accuracy of the ear in distinguishing faint or similar sounds, to that state in which there is no more sensation produced by sounds in this organ than in any other part of the body. Deafness is the usual concomitant of complete deafness, but in general results rather from the absence of incitement by the sense of hearing than from any natural defect in the organs of speech. See deaf-mute.

He answered that it was impossible for him to hear a man three yards off, by reason of deafness that had held him fourteen years.

State Trials, Earl of Strafford, ac. 1640.

2. Unwillingness to hear; voluntary rejection of what is addressed to the ear or to the understanding.

I found such a deafness that no declaration from the bishops could take place.

Edwin Beattie.

Deaf-makers' deafness, deafness due to occupation in the midst of loud and continuous noise, as in the case of a boiler-maker. It is marked by catarrh of the middle ear, with more or less nervous exhaustion.

deaf<sup>1</sup> (däl), n. [ME. derl, del, del, AS. däl, mutated form (after the verb) of the reg. but Hence—2. An indefinite quantity, degree, or extent: as, a deaf of time and trouble; a deaf of snow; a deaf of money. In this sense usually qualified with great or good: as, a great deaf of labor; a good deaf of one's time.

Gratiano speaks an infinite deaf of nothing.

Shak., M. of V., l. 1.

A very little thief of occasion will rob you of a great deal of patience. Shak. Cor., II. 1.

3. The division or distribution of cards in playing; the act or practice of dealing; the right or privilege of distributing the cards: a single round, during which all the cards dealt at one time are played.

How can the muse her aid impart,
Unskill'd in all the terms of art,
Or in harmonious numbers put
The deal, the shuffle, and the cut? Swift.

4. Hence, a bargain or arrangement among a number of persons for mutual advantage as against others; a secret commercial or political transaction for the exclusive benefit of those engaged in it: as, a deal in wheat or cotton; they made a deal for the division of the offices. [U.S.]

The President had definitely abandoned the maxims and practices of a local manager of Machine politics in New York, with the shifts and expedients and deals which had illustrated his rise to political prominence.

deal<sup>2</sup> (dél), n. [MD. dele, D. deel, a board, plank, threshing-floor, = MLG. dele, LG. dele, a board, plank, floor of a room, also, in form dale, a threshing-floor, = OHG. dāl, dālo, MHG. dāl, dille, G. diele, a board, plank, floor of boards, = Iscl. dila = Dan. dila = Sw. dila = AS. dēla, a plank, thille, a board (cf. breda thilling, translating L. area, a threshing-floor) (cf. Slov. dila = Pol. dyl = Little Russ. dyle, a board, deal—prob. < OHG.), = OBulg. dilo = Skt. dala, ground (cf. L. tellus, the earth). The AS. word has suffered a similar restriction of meaning, being now E. thill, the shaft or pole of a cart, etc. Thus deal<sup>2</sup> is a doublet of thill: see thill. The word deal<sup>2</sup> is usually identified with deal<sup>1</sup>, a part, with the accommodated definition "the division of a piece of timber made by sawing." 1. A board or plank. The name deal is applied chiefly to planks of pine or fir above 7 inches in width and of various lengths exceeding 6 feet. If 7 inches or less wide, they are called battens; and when under 6 feet long they are called deal-ends. The usual thickness is 3 inches, and width 9 inches. The standard size, to which other sizes may be reduced, is 3 inches thick, 11 inches broad, and 12 feet long. A whole deal is a deal which is 14 inches thick; a stik deal, one of half that thickness. The word is little used in the United States.

I had little furniture, so I bought a cart-load of deals; took a carpenter . . . into my service; established him in a barn, and said, "Jack, furnish my house."

Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, vil.

2. Wood of fir or pine, such as deals are made from: as, a floor of deal.

A piece of deal, far thicker than one would easily imagine, being purposely interposed betwixt my eye placed in a room, and the clearer daylight, . . . appeared quite through a lovely red.

Boyle, Colours.

Red deal, the wood of the Scotch pine, Pinus sylvestris, a highly valuable and durable timber.

dealbater (dē-al'bāt), v. [L. dealbatus, pp. of dealbare, whiten, whitewash, plaster, parge, < de (intensive) + albare, whiten, < albus, white. See dab, which is from the same source.] To whiten.

An ecclesiastical title in the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches, which has had several applications. Civil officials so called were known to the Roman law, and are mentioned in the codes of Theodosius and Justinian. The title was thence adopted for Christian use. In the monasteries, for every ten monks a decanus or dean was nominated, who had the charge of their discipline. The senior dean, in the absence of the abbot and provost, governed the monastery; and, since monks had the charge of many cathedral churches, the office of dean was thus introduced into them. Custom gradually determined that there should be only one dean in a cathedral, and he eventually assumed the chief charge of its ecclesiastical and ritual concerns, especially in regard to the choir. He became also general assistant to the bishop. In the Roman Catholic Church, assistants of the bishop, termed rural deans, in France in former times often possessed, and in Germany in certain cases still possess, large powers of visitation, administration, and jurisdiction, so that their authority is almost equal to that of bishops. In the Church of England there are, besides the deans of the cathedrals, called deans of chapters, whose authority is next that of the bishop, rural deans, who are in effect assistants to the bishop, and whose duty it is to visit certain parishes in the diocese, and report on their condition to the bishop. Their functions at one time became almost obsolete, but they have been revived to some extent in recent times. The word is also applied in England to the chief officers of certain peculiar churches or chapels: as, the dean of the king's chapel. In the Episcopal Church in America the presiding presbyter of the semi-official body known as a convention, and of the division of a diocese represented by this body, which division is also called a convention and is in some respects analogous to the English rural deanery, is called a dean (the dean of convention).

To save a bishop, may I name a dean?

Pope, Epil. to Satires, II. 22.

2. In universities, originally, the head of a faculty (and most historical writers consider a dean as essential to the existence of a faculty). The office was at first directly or indirectly elective for one or two years, while commonly filled by the eldest master. But the faculties, having in Great Britain and America lost their early more independent corporate existence, are now usually presided over by the head of the university, and the office of dean has sunk to that of a mere registrar or secretary, or has ceased to exist. In English colleges the dean presides in chapel, looks after the moral and religious welfare of the scholars, and is charged with the preservation of discipline. The office is commonly united with one of the tutorships. The office of dean of a college or school is evidently a mere adaptation of that of dean of a monastery, and as such dates from far earlier times than that of dean of a faculty, although the faculties long preceded the colleges.

Certain canons, or deanes, appointed to look to the behaviour and manner of the students there (at Cambridge). Hollinshed, Chronicles.

He long'd at college, only long'd,

All else was well, for she-society. . . .
They lost their weeks; they vexed the souls of deans.

Tennyson, Princess, Pro.

8. The oldest member in length of service of a constituted body, or a body of persons of equal rank, of whom he is the prescriptive leader in all joint action: as, the dean of the diplomatic corps; the dean of the French Academy; the dean of the Sacred College (the oldest of the cardinals, who possesses high authority by right of his seniority).—4. The president for the time being of an incorporation of barristers or law practitioners.—Dean and chapter, a bishop's council, consisting of the dean and his prebendaries, whose duties consist in aiding the bishop with their advice in affairs of religion and in the temporal concerns of his see.—Dean of Arches, the chief judicial officer of the Archbishop of Canterbury, dean of the Court of Arches, but not really a dean in the modern sense of the word.—Dean of Faculty, the president of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland.—Dean of guild. (a) The chief officer of a medieval trade-gild, and of some existing gilds in Europe.

They represented that it had been customary to consult, after the city magistracy, only the captains of companies and the deans of guilds in matters of government.

Melley, Dutch Republic, III. 20.

(b) In Scotland, the elected head of the merchant company or gildry of a royal burgh, who is a magistrate of the burgh for the supervision of all matters relating to the erection and character of buildings. The office in the full sense now exists only in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Perth, its duties in other burghs being performed by an officer bearing the same title, elected by the town council.—Dean of gold coin, in Scotland, a court presided over by the dean of gold, the jurisdiction of which is confined to the regulation of buildings to such matters of police as have any connection with buildings, and to the regulation of weights and measures.—Dean of penitentiaries. See penitentiary.—Dean of the chapel royal, a title bestowed on six clergymen of the Church of Scotland, who receive from the crown a portion of the revenues which formerly belonged to the chapel royal in Scotland.—Dean of the province of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, to whom, when a convocation is to be assembled, the archbishop sends his mandate for summoning the bishops of the province.

deanery (dē-ne-ri), n.; pl. deaneries (-ris). [dean + -ry. Cf. MLL. decanaria, a deanery.]

1. The office or the revenue of a dean.

When he could no longer keep the deanery of the chapel-royal, he made him his successor in that near attendance upon the king. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

Because I don't value your deanship a straw. Swift.

deanthropomorphism (dē-an'thrō-pō-mōr'-fizm), n. [deanthropomorphize + -ism.] The process of getting rid of anthropomorphic notions.

Hence, as Mr. Fiske has shown in detail, so soon as anthropomorphism has assumed its highest state of development, it begins to be replaced by a continuous growth of deanthropomorphism, which, passing through polytheism into monotheism, eventually ends in a progressive "purification" of theism—by which is meant a progressive metamorphosis of the theistic conception, tending to remove from the Deity the attributes of Humanity. Contemporary Rev., L. 52.

deanthropomorphization (dē-an'thrō-pō-mōr'-s-āz-ā-shn), n. [deanthropomorphize + -ation.]

The act of freeing from anthropomorphic attributes or conceptions.

There is one continuous process of knowing, which (if I may be allowed to invent a rather formidable word in imitation of Coleridge) is best described as a continuous process of deanthropomorphization, or the stripping off of the anthropomorphic attributes with which primeval philosophy clothed the unknown Power which is manifested in phenomena. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 176.

deanthropomorphize (dē-an'thrō-pō-mōr'-fiz), v. t.; pret. and pp. deanthropomorphized, ppr. deanthropomorphizing. [de-priv. + anthropomorphize.] To free from anthropomorphic attributes or notions.

We may proceed to gather our illustrations of the deanthropomorphizing process. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 177.

dear (dē), a. and n. [*Early mod. E. also deere, dere, < ME. deere, dere, < AS. deora, mutated dýre, beloved, precious, of great value, = OS. duri = OFries. dōre, dōre = D. dior, dior = OHG. duri, MHG. dūre, G. theuer = Icel. dýrr = Sw. The popular name of several small beetles which make a ticking or clicking sound, supposed by superstitious persons to be ominous of death. (a) Some species of the genus Anobium, or serricorn beetles, of the family Pisicidae, as A. dematrum, A. tessellatum, and A. striatum. These insects abound in old houses, where they get into the wood by boring, and make a clicking sound by standing up on their hind legs and knocking their heads against the wood quickly and forcibly several times in succession, the number of distinct strokes being in general from seven to eleven. This is the call of the sexes.

Few ears have escaped the noise of the death-watch that is, the little clicking sound heard often in many rooms, somewhat resembling that of a watch; and this is conceived to be of an evil omen or prediction of some person's death. . . . This noise is made by a little sheath-winged grey insect, found often in wainscot benches.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 7.

"Alas! the poor gentleman will never get from hence," said the landlady to me—"for I heard the death-watch all night long."

decapite (de-kap-i-tat), a. [F. decapité, pp. of decapiter, decapitate.] In her., having the head cut off smoothly: said of an animal used as a bearing. Also decapit. Compare couped.

decapod (dek-a-pod), a. and n. [< NL. decapus (neut. pl. decapoda), < Gr. dekapous, having ten feet (used only in sense of 'ten feet long'), . deka, = E. ten, + πους (pod-) = E. foot.] 1. a. Having ten feet, as a crustacean, or ten rays or arms, as a cephalopod; pertaining to the Decapoda in either sense. Also decapodal, decapodous.

II. n. 1. In Crustacea, a decapodous or ten-footed crustacean, as a crab, lobster, shrimp, or prawn; one of the Decapoda.—2. In Mollusca, a decapodous or ten-armed cephalopod; one of the Decapoda.

Also, rarely, decapode.

Decapoda (de-kap'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of decapus, having ten feet: see decapod.]

1. The ten-footed crustaceans; those Crustacea which have five pairs of legs or ambulatory appendages, at least one pair of which is chelate; an order of podophthalmic or stalk-eyed Crustacea. See cuts under Podophthalmia and stalk-eyed. They have the branches inclosed in special lateral thoracic receptacles; a large dorsal carapace or cephalothoracic shield, formed by fusion of the cephalic and thoracic somites, and usually prolonged in front as a beak or rostrum; gnathites or mouth-parts consisting of a pair of mandibles, two pairs of maxillae, and three pairs of maxillipeds or foot-jaws; and five pairs of ambulatory legs, the first pair of which is usually enlarged, and otherwise modified into great pincer-like claws or chelipeds. The shell is regularly shed, annually or oftener, as long as the animal continues to grow. The order presents two extremes of form, according to the development and construction of the abdominal segments or "tail." In the long-tailed or macrurous Decapoda, as the lobster, shrimp, prawn, and crawfish, the abdomen is protruded, jointed, and flexible. In the short-tailed or brachyurous Decapoda, as the crabs, it is reduced and folded under the thorax, forming the apron. Various intermediate conditions are also found, as in the hermit-crabs. In consequence, the Decapoda are divided into Macrura and Brachyura, with or without an intermediate group Anomura. See these words.

2. The ten-armed cephalopods; a division of the dibranchiate or acetaluliferous Cephalopoda, as distinguished from Octopoda, having two long tentacles or cephalic processes (besides the eight arms or rays), bearing suckers only at their ends: also called Decapoda. The division includes all except the Octopoda and Argonautidae, or the cuttles, calamaries, squids, etc., of such families as Spirulidae, Boleophthalmidae, Sepiidae, Sepioidae, Loliginidae, Chroteuthidae, Lolipodidae, and Craspedothidae. See second cut under cuttle.

decapodal (de-kap'ō-dal), a. [< decapod + -al.] Same as decapod.

decapode (dek-a-pōd), a. and n. Same as decapod. [Rare.]

decapodiform (dek-a-pod'i-fōrm), a. [< NL. decapus (-pod-), decapod, + L. forma, shape.]

In entom., similar in form to a lobster or crawfish: applied to certain aquatic, carnivorous, hexapod larvae with elongate tapering bodies, and swimming-lamellae on the tail. The young of the coleopterous Dytiscus and the neuropterous Agrion are examples of this form.

decapodous (de-kap'ō-dus), a. [< decapod + -ous.] Same as decapod.

Decapterygii (de-kap'ter-i-jī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. deka, = E. ten, + πτερυξ (pteryx), a fin.]

An order of fishes, containing those with ten fins. Bloch and Schneider.

decarbonate (de-kar'bonāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbonated, ppr. decarbonating. [= F. decarbonater; as de + carbonate, v.] To deprive of carbon.

decarbonisation (de-kar'bon-i-zā'shon), n. [< decarbonise + -ation.] Same as decarburation.

decarbonise (de-kar'bon-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbonised, ppr. decarbonising. [= F. decarboniser; as de + carboniser.] Same as decarbure.

decarburation (de-kar'bon-i-zā'shon), n. [= F. decarburation; as decarbure + -ation.]

The process of depriving of carbon: as, the decarburation of cast-iron (a process resorted to in order to convert cast-iron into steel, or to reduce it to the state of malleable iron). Also decarburation, decarbureation.

decarbure (de-kar'bon-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbured, ppr. decarburing. [< de + carbure. Cf. F. decarburer.] To deprive wholly or in part of carbon: the opposite of carbure. Thus, cast-iron is partly decarbured in making steel; pig-iron is decarbured by cementation. See cementation. Also decarbure, decarbure. decard (de-kard'), v. t. [< de + card.] See decard. To discard.

Pedro. I would not task those sins to me committed.
Rod. You cannot, sir; you have cast those by, discarded 'em.

Flatcher, Fligim, iv, 2.

decardinalise (de-kar'di-nal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. decardinalized, ppr. decardinalising. [= F. decardinaliser; as de + priv. + cardinal + -ise.] To depose from the rank of cardinal. [Rare.]

He [the Cardinal of Guise] is but young, and they speak of a Bull that is to come from Rome to decardinalise him.

Howell, Letters, I, ii, 19.

decare (de-kar'), n. [F. decare, < Gr. deka, = E. ten, + F. are: see are.] In the metric system, a superficial measure, equal to ten times the are—that is, a thousand square meters, or very nearly a quarter of an English acre.

decaration (de-kar-nā'shon), n. [< de + priv. + carnation, after incarnation.] The putting off or laying aside of carnality or fleshly lusts.

For God's incarnation inableneth man for his own decarnation, as I may say, and devouture of carnality.

W. Montagu, Devoute Rayns, ii, 1.

decasemic (dek-a-sē'mik), a. [< Gr. dekasēmos, < deka, ten, + sema, a sign, σημαίνω, a sign, mark, note, unit of metrical measurement, mora.] In anc. pros., consisting of ten units of metrical measurement: as, a decasemic colon.

decasepalous (dek-a-sēp'a-lus), a. [< Gr. deka, = E. ten, + NL. sepalum, sepal.] In bot., having ten sepals.

decastere (dek-a-stēr), n. [F. decastère, < Gr. deka, = E. ten, + F. stère, < Gr. στέρη, solid: see stere.] In the metric system, a solid measure, ten times the stère or cubic meter, and nearly equal to 13.08 cubic yards. Also spelled decastere.

decastich (dek-a-stik), n. [< Gr. deka, = E. ten, + στιχ, a verse.] A poem consisting of ten lines.

decastyle (dek-a-stil), a. [= F. decastyle = Sp. decastilo = Pg. decastilo = It. decastilo, < Gr. dekastylōs, < deka, = E. ten, + στύλος, a column: see style.] Having ten columns in front, or consisting of ten columns: as, a decastyle temple or portico.

decasyllabic (dek-a-sil-lab'ik), a. [= F. decasyllabique; < Gr. deka, = E. ten, + σύν, a syllable.] Having ten syllables: as, a decasyllabic verse.

decation (de-kā'shon), n. [< Gr. dekaros = E. tenth, < deka = E. ten; with term. adapted to -ation.] The state of being tenth.

Decatoma (de-kat'ō-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. deka, = E. ten, + -τομα, < ῥέμνω, raimiv, cut.] 1. A genus of chalcid hymenopterous insects, of the subfamily Eurytominae, of great extent, the species of which uniformly inhabit cynipidous galls, whether asinquillines or parasiters. Synnota, 1811.—2. A genus of blister-beetles: same as Mylabris.—3. [Used as a plural.] In Latreille's system, a section of notacanthine Diptera, corresponding to the modern family Berididae.

decaduate (de-kā'dāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. decaduated, ppr. decaduating. [< L. de + priv. + caudate, tail: see caudate.] To cut off the tail of; deprive of the tail.

I plead the fox who, having lost his tail—as I my head—was for decaduating the vulpine species directly.

C. Roode, Harper's Weekly, May 6, 1874, p. 870.

decay (de-kā'), v. [Early mod. E. decaye, decaye; < OF. decaier, decaier, dequesier, assimilated dechaier, dechaier, dechaier, dechoier, dechoier, mod. dechoier = Fr. dechaier, dechaier = Sp. decaer = Pg. decaer = It. decaer = Sc. decaid, q. v.], fall away, decay, decline, < *ML. *decadere*, restored form of L. decidere (with modified radical vowel), fall away, fall, sink, perish (whence ult. E. deciduous, q. v.), < de, down, + cadere, fall, whence ult. E. cadence, chance, case, etc.: see these words, and cf. decadent, decadence.] 1. intr. To pass gradually from a sound or perfect state to a less perfect state, or toward weakness or dissolution; fall into an Moses and Elias, who appeared in glory, and spoke of his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem.

Luke ix. 30, 31.

—Syn. Death, Demise, Demise. Death is the common term for the ending of life. Demise is slightly euphemistic; it is less forcible and harsh than death. Demise applies primarily to a sovereign, who at death sends down or transmits his title, etc. (see quotation from Blackstone, under demise), and hence to others with reference to the transmission of their possessions. The use of demise for death apart from this idea is figurative, euphemistic, or stilted.

Among the Lepthas, the houses where there has been a death is almost always forsaken by the surviving inmates.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 130.

She had the care of Lady Ida's youth,
 And from the Queen's decease she brought her up.
Tennyson, Princess, III.

There is such a difference between dying in a sunset with a cambric handkerchief at one's eyes, and the promise reality of demise certified in the parish register.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), III. 432.

deceive (dē-sēv'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deceived, ppr. deceiving. [Early mod. E. also deceave, deceave; < ME. decevren, deavayen, deavayen, etc., < OF. deceiver, deceiver, etc., F. deceiver = Pr. deceiver = OSP. deceiver, < L. decipere, deceive, beguile, entrap, < de-, from, + capere, take: see captive. Cf. conceive, perceive, receive.] 1. To mislead by a false appearance or statement; cause to believe what is false, or to disbelieve what is true; delude.

Take heed that no man deceive you. Mat. xxiv. 4.

King Richard, who had deceived many in his time, was at this time deceived by many. Baker, Chronicles, p. 323.

Wooden work

Painted like porphyry to deceive the eye.

Browning, King and Hook, l. 54.

2. To cause to fail in fulfilment or realisation; frustrate or disappoint.

I now believed
 The happy day approach'd,
 Nor are my hopes deceived. Dryden.

3*t.* To take from; rob stealthily.

The hovelers wherein you plant your fruit-trees [should] be fair, . . . and set with fine flowers, but thin and sparingly, lest they deceive the trees. Bacon, Gardens.

4. To cause to pass; while away. [Poetic and rare.]

These occupations oftentimes deceived the listless hour.
Wordsworth.

—Syn. 1. To beguile, cheat, overreach, circumvent, dupe, fool, gull, ensnare, hoodwink.

deceiver (dē-sē'-vēr), n. One who deceives; one who leads into error; a cheat; an impostor.

My father peradventure will feel me, and I shall seem to him as a deceiver; and I shall bring a curse upon me, and not a blessing.
Gen. xxvii. 12.

Hence with thy brew'd enchantments, foul deceiver!
 Hast thou betray'd my credulous innocence
 With visor'd falsehood and base forgery?

1. The state or quality of being decent, fit, suitable, or becoming; propriety of action, speech, dress, etc.; proper formality; becoming ceremony; modesty; specifically, freedom from ribaldry or obscenity.

The Greeks call this good grace of every thing in his kinde, re-spens, the Latines [decorum], we in our vulgar call it by a scholasticall terme [decency].
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 219.

Sentiments which raise laughter can very seldom be admitted with any decency into an heroic Poem.
Addison, Spectator, No. 279.

The consideration immediately subsequent to the being of a thing is what agrees or disagrees with that thing, what is suitable or unsuitable to it; and from this springs the notion of decency or indecency, that which becomes or misbecomes.

Immodest words admit of no defence,
For want of decency is want of sense.
Roscommon, On Translated Verse, l. 114.

2. That which is decent or becoming.

The external decencies of worship. Sp. Atterbury.

He became careless of the decencies which were expected from a man so highly distinguished in the literary and political world.

deceptiveness (dē-sēp'tiv-ness), n. The power of deceiving; tendency or aptness to deceive.

deceptivity (dē-sēp'tiv-i-ti), n. [< deceptive + -ity.] 1. The quality of being deceptive.—2. Something deceptive; a sham. Carlyle. [Rare.]

deceptor (dē-sēp'tōr), a. [< OF. deceptor = Sp. Pg. deceptorio, < L. deceptorius, < deceptor, a deceiver, < L. decipere, deceive: see deceiver.] Tending to deceive; containing qualities or means adapted to mislead. [Rare.]

decebrine (dē-sēp'ē-bris), v. t.; pret. and pp. decebrined, ppr. decebrining. [< de-priv. + cerebrum + -ize.] To deprive of the cerebrum; remove the cerebrum from. [Rare.]

decern (dē-sēr'n), v. [< OF. decerner, decerner, decerner, F. decerner = Pr. decernir = Sp. decernir = It. decernere, < L. decernere, pp. decernere, decide, determine, judge, decree, < de. from, + cernere, separate, distinguish, discern: see concern, discern, and cf. devere. The word decern in II. and Rom. has been in part merged in discern.] 1. trans. 1. In Scots law, to decree; judge; adjudge.

The lords decerned him to give Frendraught a new tack of the said lands.

Spalding, Hist. Troubles in Scotland, I. 51.

2. To discern; discriminate.

They can see nothing, nor decern what maketh for them, nor what against them. Crommer, Sacraments, fol. 82.

II. intrans. In Scots law, to decree; pass judgment; an essential word in all decrees and interlocutors.

The said lords and estates of parliament find, decern, and declare that the said Francis, sometime earl of Bothwell, has committed and done open treason.

Scottish Acts, Jan. I., 1592.

decerner (dē-sēr'nér), n. One who gives a judgment or an opinion.

Those slight and vulgar decerners.

Glennville, Lux Orientalis, Pref.

decerniture (dē-sēr-ni-tūr), n. [< decern + -iture.] In Scots law, a decree or sentence of a court; as, he resolved to appeal against the decerniture of the judge.

decernment, n. [< decern + -ment; var. of discernment.] Discernment.

A yet more refined elective discretion or decernment.

Goodwin, Works, III. 482.

decerp (dē-sērp'), v. t. [< L. decerpere, pp. decerpere, pluck off, < de, off, + carpere, pluck: see carp.] To pluck off; crop; tear; rend.

O what misery was the people then in! O howe this most noble isle of the world was decert and rent to pieces!

deceptible (dē-sēp'ti-bl), a. [< L. deceptus, pp., + -ible.] That may be plucked.

deception (dē-sēp'shon), n. [< L. deceptus, pp.: see decerp.] 1. The act of pulling or plucking off; a cropping.—2. That which is pulled off or separated; a fragment.

If our souls are but particles and deceptions of our parents, then I must be guilty of all the sins that ever were committed by my progenitors ever since Adam.

Glennville, Pre-existence of Souls, III.

decertation (dē-sēr-tā'shon), n. [< L. decertatio(n)-, < decertare, contend, < de + certare, fight, contend.] Strife; contest for mastery.

A decertation between the disease and nature.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

de certificando (dē sēr-ti-fi-kan-dō), [ML. : L. de, of, to; ML. certificando, abl. of certificandus, ger. of certificare, certify: see certify.] In early Eng. law, the short name of a writ requiring an officer to certify to the court something within his cognizance.

decease, n. A Middle English form of decease.
deceasing (dē-sēsh'ing), n. [< OF. decessioun = Sp. (obs.) decessioun, < L. decessio(n)-, a departure, < decedere, pp. decessus, depart: see deceiver, decess.] Departure; decrease; diminution.

(Implying the necessity of a bishop to govern in their absence or decession any ways) they ordained St. James the first bishop of Jerusalem.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 102.

Blindness, dumbness, deafness, silence, death,
All which are neither natures by themselves
Nor substances, but mere decays of form,
And absolute decessions of nature.

Chapman, Byron's Conspiracy, l. 1.

The accession and decession of the matter.

W. Scott, Essay on Drapery, p. 7.

decessor (dē-sēs'or), n. [< L. decessor, a retiring officer, L. a predecessor, < decedere, pp. decessus, depart, retire: see decede, decess.] A predecessor.

David . . . humbled himself for the sins of his ancestors and decessors. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 777.

decharm (dē-chārm'), v. t. [< OF. decharmer, decharmer, F. décharmer, < de-, de-, priv., + charmer, charm: see charm.] To remove the spell or enchantment of; disenchant.

Notwithstanding the help of physics, he was suddenly cured by decharming the witchcraft. Harvey.

déchaussé (dē-ahō-sā'), a. [F., pp. of déchausser, take off one's shoes, make bare, < dé, from, away, + chauser, shoe, < chaussé, a shoe, < L. calceus, a shoe.] In her.: (a) Dimembered and the different parts represented as separated from one another by a little distance: said of an animal used as a bearing: as, a lion déchaussé. (b) Without claws: said of an animal used as a bearing: a term of French heraldry, sometimes used in English.

Also dimembered.

decheerful (dē-chēer'fūl), a. [Irreg. < de-priv. + cheerful.] Not cheerful; sad; depressed; gloomy.

decidedly

When didst thou ever come to me but with thy head hanging down? O deceitful pretence, uncomfortable servant!
Hudson, Your Five Gallians, IV. 7.

dechenite (dech'en-it), n. [Named after the German geologist E. H. K. von Dechen (1800-1890).] A native vanadate of lead, occurring massive, with botryoidal structure, and of yellowish- or brownish-red color.

dechlorometer (dē-klō-mē'ter), n. Same as chlorometer (with unnecessary prefix).

dechristianize (dē-kris'ti-an-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. dechristianized, ppr. dechristianizing. [= F. déchristianiser; as de-priv. + christianize.] To turn from Christianity; banish Christian belief and principles from; paganize. Also spelled dechristianise.

deci- [Short for decim-, < L. decimus, tenth: see decimal.] An element, meaning 'tenth', in the nomenclature of the metric system, as in decimeter, the tenth of a meter, decigram, the tenth of a gram, etc.

deciare (des-ik'r), n. [< F. déciare, < L. decimus, tenth, + F. are, are: see are.] In the metric system, a unit of superficial measure, the tenth part of an are, or 107.6 square feet, English measure.

decidable (dē-si'dā-bl), a. [< decide + -able.] That may be decided.

decide (dē-sid'), v.; pret. and pp. decided, ppr. deciding. [< ME. deciden, < OF. decider, F. décider = Sp. Pg. decidir = It. decidere, < L. decideré, decide, also lit. cut off, < de, off, + cadere, cut. Cf. deise, and concise, incise, etc.] 1. trans. 1. To cut off; separate.

Our seat denies us traffick here;
The sea, too near, decides us from the rest.
Fuller, Holy State, II. 20.

2. To determine, as a question, controversy, or struggle, by some mode of arbitrament; settle by giving the victory to one side or the other; determine the issue or result of; adjust; conclude; end: as, the court decided the case in favor of the plaintiff; the umpire decided the contest; the fate of the bill is decided.

The quarrel toucheth none but us alone;
Betwixt ourselves let us decide it then.
Shak., I Hen. VI., IV. 1.

They [the Greeks] were the first . . . to decide questions of war and policy by the free vote of the people fairly taken.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lect., p. 262.

They fought with unabated ardour; and the victory was only decided by their almost total extermination.

H. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

3. To resolve; determine in the mind: as, he decided to go.

Who decided
What our gifts, and what our wants should be?
M. Arnold, Self-Deception.

II. intrans. To determine; form a definite opinion; come to a conclusion; pronounce a judgment: as, the court decided in favor of the defendant; to decide upon one's course.

Who shall decide when doctors disagree?

Pope, Moral Essays, III. 1.

Shall I wait a day ere I decide
On doing or not doing justice here?
Browning, King and Book, I. 17.

decided (dē-si'ded), a. [< F. décidé = Sp. Pg. decidido, pp., used in the same way.] 1. Free from ambiguity or uncertainty; unmistakable; unquestionable: as, a decided improvement.

I find much cause to reproach myself that I have lived so long, and have given no decided and public proofs of my being a Christian.

P. Henry, in Wirt's Sketches.

2. Resolute; determined; free from hesitation or wavering: as, a decided character.

A politic caution, a guarded circumspection, were among the ruling principles of our forefathers in their most decided conduct.

Burke.

=Syn. 1. Decided, Decisive, indisputable, undeniable, certain, positive, absolute. Decided and decisive are sometimes confounded, but are distinct, decided being passive and decisive active. A decided victory is a real, unmistakable victory; a decisive victory is one that decides the issue of the campaign. The battle of Bull Run ended in a decided victory, but not a decisive one; the victory at Waterloo was both decided and decisive. Compare a decided answer with a decisive one. The difference is the same as between definite and definitive. See definite.

He had marked preferences, and . . . his opinions were as decided as his prejudices.

Edinburgh Rev.

The sentence of superior judges is final, decisive, and irrevocable.

Blackstone.

All the most eminent men . . . Hampden excepted, were inclined to half measures. They desired a decisive victory almost as much as a decisive overthrow.

Macleay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

3. Unhesitating.
decidedly (dē-si'ded-ly), adv. In a decided or determined manner; clearly; indisputably; in a manner to preclude doubt.

While tasting something decidedly bitter, sweetness cannot be thought of.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 22.

decidedness (dē-sī'ded-nēs), n. The state of being decided.

decidedly (dē-sī'ded-ly), adv. [decide + -ment.] The act of deciding; decision.

See, signior 'there be times, and terms of honour To argue three things in, decidedness able To speak to noble gentlemen, ways points And to the life of us all, you're too rugged!

Fletcher (and another), Love's Pilgrimage, li 1 deciduous (dē-sīd'ū-ŭs), n. [L. deciduus (t), pp. of decidere, fall off, fall down, < de- + cadere, fall: see cadence and decay.] A falling off.

Men observing the deciduous of the thorn do fall upon the conceit that it annually rotteth away, and successively reneweth again.

See T. Brown, Vulg. Err.

decider (dē-sī'dēr), n. One who decides; one who or that which determines a cause or contest.

I dare not take upon me to be umpire and decider of those many alterations among chronologies.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 71.

decidingly (dē-sī'ding-ly), adv. In a deciding manner; decisively.

But Herodotus who wrote his (Homer's) life hath cleared this point . . . and so decidingly concluded, etc.

See T. Brown, Vulg. Err., vii 12.

decidua (dē-sīd'ū-ŭ), n. [NL. sc. membrana, the membrane that falls off, fem. of L. deciduus, that falls down: see deciduous.] In physiol., a membrane arising from alteration of the upper layer of the mucous membrane of the uterus, after the reception into the latter of the impregnated ovum, the name being given to it because it is discharged at parturition. At an early stage of the development of the human ovum the decidua exhibits a threefold division: a layer immediately lining the uterine cavity, called the decidua vera (true decidua); a second layer, immediately investing the embryo, called the decidua reflexa (turned back decidua); and a third layer, or rather a special development of part of the decidua vera, called the decidua serotina (late decidua).

decidual (dē-sīd'ū-ŭl), a. [decidua + -al.] Of or pertaining to the decidua.

deciduarily (dē-sīd'ū-ŭ-ŕ-ly), adv. [L. deciduus (see deciduous) + E. -ary.] Falling off; dropping away; deciduous. [Rare.]

The shedding of the deciduaria margins may be compared with the shedding by very young birds of their down.

Darwin, Descent of Man, li 77.

Deciduata (dē-sīd'ū-ŭ-tā), n. pl. [NL. neut. pl. of deciduus: see decidua.] One of the two major divisions (the other being Non-deciduata) into which monodelphous mammals have been divided. See the extract.

In the Deciduata . . . the superficial layer of the mucous membrane of the uterus undergoes a special modification, and unites . . . with the villi developed from the chorion of the fetus, and, at birth, this decidua and maternal part of the placenta is thrown off along with the fetus, the mucous membrane of the uterus . . . being regenerated during, and after, each pregnancy.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 222.

deciduate (dē-sīd'ū-ŭ-tā), a. [NL. deciduatus, having a decidua, < decidua, a decidua: see decidua.] 1. Having a decidua or a deciduous placenta; pertaining to or having the characters of the Deciduata.—2. Being deciduous, as a placenta.

deciduity (dē-sīd'ū-ŭ-ty), n. [deciduous + -ity.] Deciduousness. [Rare.]

deciduosity (dē-sīd'ū-ŭ-s-ty), n. [F. décidu = Sp. deciduo, < L. deciduus, that falls down, < de- + cadere, fall down, < de- down, + cadere, fall: see decay.] Falling off or liable to fall, especially after a definite period of time; not perennial or permanent.

There is much that is deciduous in books, but all that gives them a title to rank as literature in the highest sense is perennial.

Lovell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 177.

Deciduous institutions imply deciduous sentiments.

H. Spencer, Social Station, p. 468.

Specifically.—(a) In bot. (1) Falling off at maturity or at the end of the season, as petals, leaves, fruit, etc.: in distinction from succulent or caducous organs, which fall soon after their appearance, and from perennial or permanent, or, as applied to leaves, from evergreen. (2) Losing the foliage every year: as, deciduous trees. (b) In zool.: (1) Falling off at a certain stage of an animal's existence, as the hair, horns, and teeth of certain animals. (2) Losing certain parts regularly and periodically, or at certain stages or ages: as, a deciduous insect.—Deciduous ovals or pieces of the mandibles, in entom., appendages, one on the outer side or end of each mandible, which are generally lost soon after the insect attains the imago state, leaving scars. They are found in a single family of rhynchophorous Coleoptera, the Stenopodidae.—Deciduous dentition. See dentition.—Deciduous insects, those insects that cast off their wings after copulation, as the females of ants and termites.—Deciduous membrane. See decidua.

deciduousness (dē-sīd'ū-ŭ-s-nēs), n. The quality of being deciduous.

decigram, decigramme (dēs'ī-gram), n. [F. decigramme = Sp. decigrammo = Pg. decigrammo = It. decigramma, < L. decim(mus), tenth, + NL. gramma, gram.] In the metric system, a weight of one tenth of a gram, equal to 1.54 grains troy.

decil, decile (dēs'īl), n. [F. déci = It. decile, irreg. < L. decimus, tenth, < decem = E. ten.] An aspect or position of two planets when they are a tenth part of the zodiac (36°) distant from each other.

deciliter, decilitre (dēs'ī-lē-tēr), n. [F. décilitre = Sp. decilitro = Pg. It. decilitro, < L. decimus, tenth, + NL. litra, liter: see liter.] In the metric system, a measure of capacity equal to one tenth of a liter, or 3.52 English fluidounces, or 3.88 United States fluidounces.

decillion (dēs'īl-yon), n. [Irreg. < L. decem, ten, + E. (m)illion.] 1. According to English notation, a million involved to the tenth power, being a unit with sixty ciphers annexed.—2. According to the modern French notation, which is also used in the United States, a thousand involved to the eleventh power, being a unit with thirty-three ciphers annexed. (Owing to the ambiguity resulting from the partial adoption of the second meaning, this and similar words (except million) are practically disused.)

decillionth (dēs'īl-yon-th), a. and n. [decillion + -th.] 1. a. Pertaining to a decillion; having the magnitude or position of one of a decillion equal parts.

II. n. The quotient of unity divided by a decillion; one of a decillion equal parts.

decima (dēs'ī-mā), n.; pl. decimæ (-mē). [L. decima, tenth: see decimal.] 1. In music: (a) An interval of ten diatonic degrees, being an octave and a third. (b) An organ-stop whose pipes sound a tenth above the keys struck.—2. A Spanish money: the tenth of a real vellon, or about 5 cents in United States money.

decimal (dēs'ī-māl), a. and n. [OF. decimal, F. décimal = Sp. Pg. decimal = It. decimale = D. decimal = G. Dan. Sw. decimal, < ML. decimālis, < L. decimus, tenth, < decem = E. ten: see ten.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to the tenth or to tens; proceeding by tens.—2. Relating to tithes.

Regulating the jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Courts in causes testamentary, decimal, and matrimonial.

Heflin, Hist. Presbyterianism, p. 469.

Decimal arithmetic, the ordinary method of arithmetical calculation by the Arabic notation. The term is sometimes restricted to the calculation with decimals.—Decimal currency. See currency.—Decimal fraction, a fraction whose denominator is a power of 10. So long as the quantity is conceived as having a power of 10 for its denominator it is properly and usually called a decimal fraction, however it may be written. The ordinary method of writing it is by prefixing to the numerator (used alone) a dot (the decimal point) with a number of zeros sufficient to make the number of places in the numerator equal to that in the denominator, less one. Thus,  $\frac{1}{10} = .1$ ,  $\frac{1}{100} = .01$ , etc.;  $\frac{205}{100} = 2.05$ , etc. See II.

Decimal measure, any measure belonging to a decimal system.—Decimal notation, a system of writing numbers depending on powers of 10, especially the ordinary system by means of nine digits and a cipher. The system in an imperfect form, wanting the 0 (the places being preserved by ruled columns), is believed to have been invented in India, and is explained in the Latin geometry of Boethius (died about A. D. 525). The genuineness both of the passage and of the entire work has been much disputed, but is now more usually conceded. The system was, however, entirely disused in Europe until (having been completed by the invention of the 0) it was reintroduced through the Arabians (by whom it is called the Indien notation), being first systematically explained in the work of Leonardo da Pisa, about 1200. The extension of the system to fractions was accomplished much later. See II.—Decimal numeration, any system of naming numbers by taking them in multiples and powers of 10. Such systems have generally prevailed in all languages, being founded on the use of the ten fingers as helps to count.—Decimal place, the position of a figure in decimal notation.—Decimal point, a dot separating the whole part from the fractional part of an expression in decimal notation. The decimal point appears to have been first used by Napier (Constructio, 1619); the writing of it above the line by Newton. See II.—Decimal system, any system of measurement or of counting whose units are powers of 10; especially, the metric system (which see, under metric).

II. n. An expression denoting a decimal fraction by an extension of the decimal notation. A dot, called the decimal point, being placed to the right of the unit's place, figures are written to the right of it, the first place in passing to the right being appropriated to tenths, the second to hundredths, etc. Thus, 19992.3 is the same as 19992  $\frac{3}{10}$ ; 19992.03 is the same as 19992  $\frac{3}{100}$ ; and 1.999203 is the same as 1  $\frac{999203}{1000000}$ . (See Decimal fraction, above.) The invention of decimals is usually attributed to Stevinus (1586). In his notation a mixed number, for example 1999  $\frac{3}{10}$ , would have been written 1999.3. The decimal point may be placed above the line (as common practice) or on the line.—Recurring decimal, a decimal in which after a certain point the digits are continually repeated. If there is but one recurring figure, the expression is called a repeating decimal; if there are more than one, the expression is called a circulating decimal. But these decimals are not commonly observed with strictness. A circulating decimal is denoted by means of dots over the first and last figures of the recurring period. Thus,  $\frac{1}{3}$  is 0.333, that is, 0.33333333, etc.

decimalism (dēs'ī-māl-izm), n. [decimal + -ism.] The theory or system of a decimal notation or division, as of numbers, currency, weights, etc.

decimalist (dēs'ī-māl-ist), n. [decimal + -ist.] One who employs or advocates computation or numeration by tens.

Of course all these fifteens and sixties were objectionable to the pure decimalist.

The Engineer, LXV. 22.

decimalization (dēs'ī-māl-iz-ā-shn), n. The act of reducing or causing to conform to the decimal system.

When the decimalization of English money was first proposed, the notion of international money had never been seriously entertained, and hardly indeed conceived.

Jeans, Money and Mech. of Exchange, p. 178.

decimalise (dēs'ī-māl-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. decimalised, prp. decimalising. [decimal + -ise.] To reduce to the decimal system: as, to decimalise currency, weights, measures, etc.

decimally (dēs'ī-māl-ly), adv. By tens; by means of decimals.

decimate (dēs'ī-māt), v. t.; pret. and pp. decimated, prp. decimating. [L. decimatus, pp. of decimare (> F. décimer = Sp. obs.) Pg. decimar = It. decimare = D. decimieren = G. decimiren = Dan. decimere = Sw. decimera], select the tenth by lot (for punishment), pay tithes, < decimus, tenth: see decimal.] 1. To take the tenth part of or from; tithe.

I have heard you are as poor as a decimated Cavalier [referring to Cromwell's 10 per cent. income-tax on Cavaliers], and had not one foot of land in all the world.

Dryden, Wild Gallant, li 2.

2. To select by lot and put to death every tenth man of: as, to decimate a captured army or a body of prisoners or mutineers (a barbarity occasionally practised in antiquity).

(And sometimes decimates or tithes delinquent persons, and they die for a common crime, according as (Iud hac) cast their lot in the decrees of predestination.

Jor. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I 280.

3. Loosely, to destroy a great but indefinite number or proportion of: as, the inhabitants were decimated by fever; the troops were decimated by the enemy's fire.

It [England] had decimated itself for a question which involved no principle, and led to no result.

Froude, Hist. Eng.

decimation (dēs'ī-mā'ā-shn), n. [F. décomposition = Pg. decimatio = It. decimazione, < L. decimatio (> n.) < decimare, decimate: see decimate.] 1. A titling; specifically, an income-tax of 10 per cent. levied on the Cavaliers by Cromwell.—2. A selection of every tenth by lot, as for punishment, etc.

By decimation, and a tithe'd death, . . . take thou the destin'd tenth.

Shak., T. of A., v. 5.

And the whole army had cause to enquire into their own rebellions, when they saw the Lord of Hosts, with a dreadful decimation, taking off so many of our brethren by the work of executioners.

C. Mather, Mag. Chris., v. 9.

3. The destruction of a great but indefinite number or proportion of people, as of an army or of the inhabitants of a country; a heavy loss of life.

decimator (dēs'ī-mā-tōr), n. [F. décimateur = It. decimatore; as decimate + -or.] One who or that which decimates.

decime (dēs'ī-mē), n. [F. decime, a tenth, tithe, decime (in older form dième, dième, > E. dième), < L. decimus, tenth: see decimal and dime.] A French coin, the tenth of a franc, or about 2 United States cents.

decimestrial (dēs'ī-mēs'tri-ŭl), a. [L. decem, = E. ten, + -estrie, adj. form in comp. of mensis, a month, q. v. Cf. semestrial.] Consisting of or containing ten months. [Rare.]

The decimestrial year still survived long after regal governments had ceased.

W. Smith, Dict. Greek and Rom. Antiq., p. 122.

decimeter (dēs'ī-mē-tēr), n. [F. décimètre (> Sp. decimetro = Pg. decimetro), < L. decimus, tenth, + F. mètre = E. meter.] In the metric system, a measure of length equal to the tenth part of a meter, or 3.937 inches. A square decimeter is equal to 15.5 square inches, and a decimeter cube, or liter, is 61 cubic inches, equal to 0.88 imperial quart or 1.056 United States (wine) quart.

decimo (dēs'ī-mō; Sp. pron. dā's'ī-thē-mō), n. [Sp., < L. decimus, tenth: see decimal.] In Spanish reckoning: (a) The tenth part of a peso or dollar. (b) The tenth part of an oncia or ounce.

decimole (dē-sī-mōl), n. [L. decem, ten.] In music, a group of ten notes which are to be played in the time of eight or of four notes, marked by a phrase-mark or curve inclosing the notes and including the figure 10. Also called decuplet.

decimo-sexto (dē-sī-mō-seks'tō), n. See sexto-decimo.

decimist, n. Name as decanner.

decipher (dē-sī'fēr), v. t. [After OF. dechiffrer, F. dechiffrer = Sp. dechifrar = Pg. decifrar = It. decifrare, decofrare, deiofrare, deioferare, < ML. dechiffrare (after F.), decofrare, decipher, < dē- + oīfra, cipher: see cipher.] 1. To interpret by the use of a key, as something written in cipher; make out by discovering the key to.

Zelmaue, that had the character in her heart, could easily decipher it. Sir P. Sidney.

The virtues of them [ciphers], whereby they are to be preferred, are three: that they be not laborious to write and read; that they be impossible to decipher; and in some cases, that they be without suspicion.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning (original English ed.), (Works, III. 402.)

2. To succeed in reading, as what is written in obscure, partially obliterated, or badly formed characters.

They [Wycherley's manuscripts] were so full of erasures and interlineations that no printer could decipher them. Macaulay, Leigh Hunt.

3. To discover or explain the meaning of, as of something that is obscure or difficult to be traced or understood.

I could not help deciphering something in his face above his condition. Merrin, Tristram Shandy.

All races which have long wandered and fought have become composite to a degree past deciphering. Fiske, Revolutionist, p. 103.

4. To describe or delineate.

Could I give you a lively representation of guilt and horror on this hand, and paint out eternal wrath and decipher eternal vengeance on the other, then might I show you the condition of a sinner hearing himself denied by Christ. South.

5†. To find out; detect; discover; reveal.

What's the news? That you are both decipher'd, that the news, For villains mark'd with rape. Shak., Tit And., iv. 2.

I have spoke with her, and we have a way-word, how to know one another. I come to her in white and cry "mum"; she cries "budget"; and by that we know one another. But what needs either your "mum," or her "budget"? the white will decipher her well enough. Shak., M. W. of W., v. 2.

6†. To write in cipher; conceal by means of a cipher or other disguise. [Rare.]

To be plain with you, I am the very man deciphered in his book, under the name of Venator. Cotton, in Walton's Angler, II. 225.

—Syn. 1-2. To interpret, make out, unravel.

decipherer (dē-sī'fēr), n. [decipher, v.] A description.

He was a Lord Chancellor of France, whose decipherer agrees exactly with this great prelate, sometime Lord Keeper of the Great Seal.

Sp. Hackel, Abp. Williams, II. 220.

decipherable (dē-sī'fēr-ə-bl), a. [decipher, v.] Capable of being deciphered or interpreted.

Some of the letters seized at Mr. Coleman's are not decipherable by all or any of the keys found.

Preface to Letters on Papiak Plot.

decipherer (dē-sī'fēr-ēr), n. One who interprets what is written in ciphers, or reads what is written obscurely.

Suppose that ciphers were well managed, there be multitudes of them that exclude the decipherer.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning (original English ed.), (Works, III. 402.)

There are a sort of those narrow-eyed decipherers . . . that will extort strange and absurd meanings out of any subject. B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

decipherment (dē-sī'fēr-mənt), n. [decipher, v.] The act of deciphering; interpretation.

They [the Assyrian tablets exhumed by Layard and Smith] are now among the collections of the British Museum, and their decipherment is throwing a new and strange light on the cosmogony and religions of the early East.

Dunson, Origin of World, p. 19.

decipia (dē-sīp'i-ā), n. [NL., < decipium, q. v.] The oxid of decipium. Its formula is doubtful, being either  $DpO$  or  $Dp_2O_3$ . Its properties are not yet fully ascertained.

decipium (dē-sīp'i-um), n. [NL., irreg. < L. decipere, deceive: see deceive.] Chemical symbol,  $Dp$ ; atomic weight, 106 if the oxid is  $DpO$ , or 171 if, as is likely, the oxid is  $Dp_2O_3$ . A substance found in the mountains of North Carolina, and said to be a metallic element intermediate in character between the metals of the cerium and yttrium groups. Its salts are colorless. The acetate crystallizes easily.

decide, v. t. [L. decidere, pp. of decidere, decide: see decide, and et. conicere, incidere, etc.] To decide; settle; determine.

No man more profoundly discusseth or more fully decideth the use of ceremonies. J. Udal, Prof. to Matthew.

decision (dē-sīsh'ən), n. [OF. decison, F. decison = Sp. decison = Pg. deciso = It. decisione, < L. decido (n.), < decidere, cut off, decide: see decide.] 1†. The act of separating or cutting off; detachment of a part; excision.

The essence of God is incorporeal, spiritual, and indivisible; and therefore his nature is really communicated, not by derivation or decision, but by a total and plenary communication.

Sp. Pearson, Expos. of Creed, II. 2.

2. Determination, as of a contest or an event; end, as of a struggle; arbitrament: as, the decision of a battle by arms.

When the Contract is broken, and there is no third person to judge, then the Decision is by Arms. Selden, Table-Talk, p. 115.

Their arms are to the last decision bent, And fortune labours with the vast intent. Drayton.

3. Determination, as of a question or a doubt; final judgment or opinion in a case which has been under deliberation or discussion: as, the decision of the Supreme Court.

What shall finally be done with Spain respecting the Mississippi? becomes an interesting question, and one pressing on us for a decision.

Monroe, in Encyclopædia of Hist. Const., I. 510.

Her clear and bared limbs O'erthwarted with the brazen-headed spear Upon her pearly shoulder leaning cold, The while, above, her full and earnest eyes Over her snow-cold breast and earnest cheek Kept watch, waiting decision. Pennington, Kenone.

4. A resolution; a fixing of a purpose in the mind.—5. The quality of being decided; ability to form a settled purpose; prompt determination: as, a man of decision.—Fifty Decisions, the final disposition by Justinian of fifty questions concerning which the authorities on Roman law were not agreed. They were made A. D. 529–30, and were embodied in the new (or revised) Code of Justinian.—Syn. 3 and 5. Decision, Verdict, Judgment, Decree, Order, Adjudication.

In law the following distinctions are usual: A decision is the determination of an issue by a judge or court; a verdict, by a jury; a report, one submitted to the court by a referee, master, or auditor; a judgment, decree, or order, the formal entry or document embodying the determination. Adjudication is generally used in connection with the effect of a judgment, decree, or order in settling the question.—6. Decision, Determination, Resolution. Decision is the quality of being able to make up one's mind promptly, clearly, and firmly as to what shall be done and the way to do it. Determination is the settling upon some line of action with a fixed purpose to stick to it; it is somewhat nearer than the others to doggedness, and sometimes approaches obstinacy. Determination may be negative, as not to do a thing, but resolution is generally positive or active: it often implies more courage than the others, and is otherwise more high-minded. But these words are often used interchangeably.

Unity, secrecy, decision are the qualities which military arrangements require. Macaulay, Halifax's Const. Hist.

When the force of habit is added, the determination becomes invincible, and seems to assume rank with the great laws of nature. Foster, Decision of Character, II.

We cannot willingly admit that those gentle affections are totally incompatible with the most impregnable resolution and vigor. Foster, Decision of Character, v.

decisional (dē-sīsh'ən-əl), a. [decision + -al.] Pertaining or relating to a decision; authoritative. [Rare.]

These opinions of the minority can have no decisional effect. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 503.

decisive (dē-sī'siv), a. and n. [OF. decisif, F. décisif = Sp. Pg. It. decisivo, < L. deciusus, pp. of decidere, decide: see decide.] I. a. 1. Having the power or quality of determining a question, doubt, contest, event, etc.; final; conclusive; putting an end to controversy: as, the opinion of the court is decisive on the question.

He is inclined to substitute rapid movements and decisive engagements for the languid and dilatory operations of his courtiers. Macaulay, Macchiavelli.

In each new threat of faction the ballot has been, beyond expectation, right and decisive.

Kierulff, Fortunes of the Republic.

Only when a revolution in circumstances is at once both marked and permanent, does a decisive alteration of character follow. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 452.

2. Marked by decision or prompt determination.

Strong and decisive the reply I gave. Crabbe, Works, VII. 92.

Decisive abstraction. See abstraction.—Syn. Decided, Decisive. See decided.

II. n. A decisive thing. [Rare.]

It was evidently the conduct of the Spaniards, not their arms, which was the decisive here.

Eschylus, Enc. between the French and Spanish Ambassadors.

decisively (dē-sī'siv-ly), adv. In a conclusive manner; in a manner to end deliberation, controversy, doubt, or contest.

decisiveness (dē-sī'siv-nēs), n. 1. The quality of ending doubt, controversy, or the like; conclusiveness.—2. The state of being marked by decision or prompt determination: as, decisiveness of character.

decisory (dē-sī'sō-ri), a. [F. décisoire = Sp. Pg. decisivo, < L. deciusus, pp. of decidere, decide: see decide.] Decisive. [Rare.]

decistère (dē-sī'tēr), n. [F. d'icistère, < L. decimus, tenth, + F. stère: see stère.] In the metric system, a cubic measure, equal to the tenth part of a stère, or 3.532 cubic feet.

decitizensise (dē-sī'tī-zēn-iz), r. t.; pret. and pp. decitizensized, pp. decitizensizing. [de- + priv- + citizen + -ize.] To deprive of citizenship; disfranchise.

decivilise (dē-sīv'i-līz), r. t.; pret. and pp. decivilized, pp. decivilizing. [de- + deciviliser; as de- + priv- + civilise.] To reduce or degrade from a civilized to a wilder or more savage state.

We have but to imagine ourselves decivilized—to suppose faculty decreased, knowledge lost, language vague, criticism and scepticism absent, to understand how inevitably the primitive man conceives as real the dream-personages we know to be ideal.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 71.

deck (dek), r. t. [ME. decken (rare), < MD. decken, D. dekken = MLG. decken, LG. dekken = OHG. deccan, MHG. G. decken = OFries. dekkja = Dan. dække (after LG.), prop. tekkja = Sw. tacka = Icel. þykkja = AS. theccan, E. thack, dial. thack, thack, cover: see thack, v. Deck is thus a doublet, derived from the D. and LG., of the native E. thack. The alleged AN. deccan, "ge-deccan," to which deck is generally referred, are misreadings for theccan, ge-theccan. Cf. deek, n.] 1. To cover; overspread; invest; especially, to array or clothe with something resplendent or ornamental; adorn; embellish; set out: as, to deck one's self for a wedding; she was decked with jewels.

They deck it [an image] with silver and gold. Jer. x. 4.

Whether to deck with clouds the uncoloured sky, Or wet the thirsty earth with falling showers. Milton, P. L., v. 139.

The dew with spangles decked the ground. Dryden.

When, with new furs, she aids her conquering eyes, And beauty decks with all that beauty buys. Crabbe.

2. Naut., to furnish with or as with a deck, as a vessel.

At last it was concluded to deck their long boat with their ship hatch-hen.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, II. 122.

3. In mining, to load or unload (the cars or tubs) upon the cage.—4. [CY. deek, n., S.] To discard. Gross.—Syn. 1. Ornament, Decorate, etc. See adorn. See also list under decorate.

deck (dek), n. [MD. decke, D. dek, cover, deck, = OFries. dekkja = LG. decke = OHG. deccan, deck, also decca, MHG. G. decke, cover, G. deck, deck, = Sw. däck = Dan. dæk (after LG.), deck; from the verb: see deck, v., and cf. thack, n.] 1†. A covering; anything that serves as a sheltering cover.

Being well refreshed, we visited our Targets that covered us as a Deck.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 138.

2. An approximately horizontal platform or floor extending from side to side of a ship or of a part of a ship, as of a deck-house, and supported by beams and carlines. In wooden ships the deck is formed of planks about three inches wide and three inches thick, spiked to the beams and carlines. In iron ships it is formed of iron plating riveted to the beams and girders and generally covered with wooden planking. An armored deck is protected by iron or steel plating. The spar-deck is the upper deck of those which extend from stem to stern. The main-deck is the deck immediately below the spar-deck in a double-decked ship; the quarter-deck is that part of the spar-deck which is abaft the mainmast. The topgallant forecastle-deck is a short deck above the spar-deck in the forward part of the ship, generally extending as far aft as the foremast. In a man-of-war the berth-deck is the deck below the gun-deck, where the mess-locks and tables are placed, and where the hammocks are hung. The gun-deck is the deck of a man-of-war where the battery is carried; in old line-of-battle ships, where guns were carried on three decks below the spar-deck, they were called respectively the upper, middle, and lower gun-deck. A flush deck is a spar-deck clear from stem to stern of houses or other encumbrances. The term half-deck was formerly applied to the after part of the deck next below the spar-deck, and forward of the cabin bulkhead. The hurricane-deck is the upper light deck of side-wheel passenger-steamers. The orlop-deck is below the berth-deck, and is where the cables were formerly stowed. The poop-deck is the after part of the ship, over the cabin, where the cabin is on the spar-deck. The turtle-deck or turtle-backed deck is so called from its resemblance to the back of a turtle, and is a convex deck extending a short distance aft from the stem of an ocean steamer to shed the water in a head sea; in many iron steamships of recent model there is a similar arrangement on the stern. In river-steamers in the United States the boiler-deck is the deck on which the boilers are carried. A covered deck is a deck arched so as to be higher in the middle than at the stem or stern—the opposite of the usual practice.

I boarded the king's ship: now on the beach,
Now in the want, the deck, in every cabin,
I flam'd amazement. Shak., Tempest, I. 2.

3. In winning, the platform of the cage; that part of the cage on which the cars stand or the men ride. Cages are sometimes built with as many as four decks.—4. A pile of things laid one upon another; a heap; a store; a file, as of cards or papers.

And for a song I have A paper-blurrier, who, on all occasions,
For all times and all seasons, hath such trinkets Ready in the deck. Messenger, Guardian, III. 3.

5. A pack of cards containing only those necessary to play any given game: as, a euchre deck; a bezique deck.

Well, if I chance but once to get the deck,
To deal about and shuffle as I would.
Soliman, Emperor of the Turks (1633).

6. That part of a pack which remains after the deal, and from which cards may be drawn during the course of the game.

Whiles he thought to steal the single ten,
The king was stily finger'd from the deck.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 1.

deck (dek), n. A pack of cards assorted or arranged in a known way. [Gambler's slang.]—Officer of the deck. See officer.—On deck, on hand; ready for action or duty; hence, in board, next at the bat; having the right or privilege of batting next.—Protective deck, in a warship, a steel deck several inches in maximum thickness, extending throughout the length of the ship below the water-line.—To clear the decks, to prepare a ship of war for action.—To sweep the deck or the decks. (a) To dash violently over or along the deck of a vessel, as a great wave or the fire of an enemy's guns, carrying everything before it. (b) To command every part of the deck, as with small arms, from the tops of an attacking vessel. (c) To take off or carry away all the stakes on a card-table; hence, generally, to gain everything.

deck-beam (dek'bēm), n. A strong transverse beam of timber or iron stretching across a ship from side to side, in order to support the deck and retain the sides at their proper distance.

deck-bridge (dek'brij), n. A bridge in which the roadway is laid upon the top of the truss: opposed to bottom-road or through bridge. Also called top-road bridge.

deck-cargo (dek'kār'gō), n. Cargo stowed on the deck of a vessel; a deck-load.

deck-cleat (dek'klēt), n. A cleat fastened to a deck.

deck-collar (dek'kol'ār), n. The collar or ring which lines the hole in the roof of a railroad-car, through which the stove-pipe passes.

decked (dek't), p. a. 1. Dressed; adorned.—2. Furnished with a deck or decks: as, a three-decked ship.—3. In her, edged or purged with another color: thus, the feathers of a bird of one tincture are decked of another tincture. Also marginated.

deckal, n. See deckle.

decker (dek'ēr), n. [= D. dekker (tafeldekker, driedekker) = G. dekker = Dan. dekker (in comp. tafeldekker, treddekker) = Sw. dekkare; as deck + -er. Cf. thatcher.] 1. One who or that which decks or adorns; a coverer; as, a table-decker.—2. A vessel that has a deck or decks: as, a two-decker. [Only in composition.]

deck-feather (dek'fēw'ēr), n. See feather.

deck-flat (dek'flat), n. See flat.

deck-hand (dek'hānd), n. A person regularly employed as a laborer on the deck of a vessel.

deck-head (dek'hed), n. A slipper limpet, or species of Crepidula.

deck-hook (dek'hūk), n. A heavy knee-shaped timber in the extreme end of a ship, either bow or stern, serving to support the deck and to strengthen the frame. See cut under stem.

deck-house (dek'hous), n. A small house erected on the deck of a ship for any purpose.

decking (dek'ing), n. 1. The act of adorning.—2. Ornament; embellishment.

Such glorious deckings of the temple.
Homer, II, Against Idolatry.

No decking sets forth anything so much as affection.
Sir P. Sidney.

deckle (dek'l), n. [Also written dekile, dekkel; = Sw. dekel = Russ. dekele, < LG. dekel = G. dekel (cf. D. dekel = Dan. dekel), a cover, lid, tympan, dim. of deke, cover, covering, dek, dek: see dek.] In paper-making: (a) In hand paper-making, a rectangular frame laid upon the wire mold on which the paper-pulp is placed, to confine it within the limits of the required size of sheet; in machine paper-making, a belt of linen and scotchouse placed on either side of the apron, to keep the pulp from spreading out laterally and making the paper wider than is desired. (b) The rough or raw edge of paper; specifically, the ragged edge of handmade paper, produced by the deckle.

deckle-edged (dek'l-ējd), a. See the extract.

Deckle-edged. This term has lately been adopted in the advertisements of books to indicate that the edges of the paper have not been cut or trimmed, so that it is equivalent to the more common designation, "rough-edged."

N. and Q., 7th ser., v. 237.

deckle-strap (dek'l-strap), n. A strap used on paper-making machines to confine the flow of the pulp and to determine the width of the sheet.

deck-load (dek'lōd), n. Same as deck-cargo.

deck-passage (dek'pas'ij), n. Conveyance of a passenger on the deck of a vessel.

deck-passenger (dek'pas'gn-jēr), n. A passenger who pays for accommodation on the deck of a vessel.

deck-pipe (dek'pīp), n. An iron pipe through which the chain-cable is paid into the chain-locker.

deck-planking (dek'plang'king), n. Planking cut suitably for forming the deck of a vessel.

deck-plate (dek'plāt), n. A metallic plate placed about the smoke-stack or the furnace of a marine engine, to protect the wood of the deck.

deck-pump (dek'pūmp), n. A hand-pump used for washing decks.

deck-sheet (dek'shēt), n. The sheet of a studding-sail leading directly to the deck, by which it is staided until set.

deck-stopper (dek'stop'ēr), n. A strong stopper used for securing the cable.

deck-tackle (dek'tak'l), n. A heavy tackle used for hauling in cable, or for other purposes.

deck-transom (dek'tran'sum), n. See transom.

decl. An abbreviation of declension.

declaim (dē-klām'), v. [ME. declamen = OF. declamer, F. declamer (> D. declameren = G. declamieren = Dan. deklamere = Sw. deklamera) = Sp. Pg. declamar = It. declamare, < L. declamare, cry aloud, make a speech, < de- (intensive) + clamare, cry, shout: see claim, clamor.] I. intrans. 1. To make a formal speech or oration; harangue.

With what impatience he declaim'd!
Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.

It is usual for masters to make their boys declaim on both sides of the argument. Swift.

To declaim on the temporal advantages . . . [the poor] enjoy, is only repeating what none either believe or practice. Goldsmith, Vicar, xxi.

2. To speak or write for rhetorical effect; speak or write pompously or elaborately, without earnestness of purpose, sincerity, or sound argument; rant.

It is not enough in general to declaim against our sins, but we must search out particularly those predominant vices which by their boldness and frequency have provoked God thus to punish us. Stillington, Sermons, I. 1.

The Rogue has (with all the Wit he could muster up) been declaiming against Wit.

Congress, Love for Love, I. 2.

At least he [Milton] does not declaim. J. A. St. John.

The preacher declaimed most furiously, for an hour, against luxury, although . . . there were not three pairs of shoes in the whole congregation.

R. Chasle, Addresses, p. 21.

3. To repeat a select piece of prose or poetry in public, as an exercise in oratory or to exhibit skill in elocution.

The undergraduates shall in their course declaim publicly in the hall, in one of the three learned languages.

Laws of Harvard Univ. (1784), in Peterson's Hist. Harv. Univ., App., p. 129.

II. trans. 1. To utter or deliver in public in a rhetorical or oratorical manner.—2. To speak as an exercise in elocution: as, he declaimed Mark Antony's speech.—3. To maintain or advocate oratorically.

Makes himself the devil's orator, and declaims his cause. South, Sermons, VIII. 82.

4. To speak against; cry down; decry.

This banquet then . . . is at once declared and declaimed, spoken of and forbidden.

Rev. F. Adams, Works, I. 178.

declamant (dē-klām'ant), n. [declaim + -ant, after L. declamant (-is), ppr. of declamare, declaim: see declaim.] Same as declaimer. [Rare.]

declaimer (dē-klām'ēr), n. One who declaims; one who speaks for rhetorical effect or as an exercise in elocution; one who attempts to convince by a harangue.

Lord declaimers on the part Of liberty, themselves the slaves of lust. Occopus.

I have little sympathy with declaimers about the Pilgrim Fathers, who look upon them all as men of grand conceptions and superhuman foresight.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 288.

declamando (dek-lā-man'dō), [It. ppr. of declamare, < L. declamare, declaim: see declaim.] In music, in a declamatory style. E. D.

declamation (dek-lā-mā'shon), n. [= D. declamatio = G. declamation = Dan. Sw. declamation, < F. déclamation = Sp. declamación = Pg. declamação = It. declamazione, < L. declamatio (-n-), < declamare, declaim: see declaim.] 1. The act or art of declaiming or making rhetorical harangues in public; especially, the delivery of a speech or an exercise in oratory or elocution, as by a student of a college, etc.: as, a public declamation; the art of declamation.

The public listened with little emotion . . . to five acts of monotonous declamation.

Macaulay.

Then crush'd by rules and weaken'd as refin'd,
For years the power of tragedy declin'd;
From hard to hard the rigid caution crept
Till declamation roar'd, while passion slept.

Johnson, Drury Lane, Prolog.

Specifically—2. In vocal music, the proper rhetorical enunciation of the words, especially in recitative and in dramatic music.—3. A public harangue or set speech; an oration.

The declamations of the pulpit described the sufferings of the saved souls in purgatory as incalculably greater than were endured by the most wretched mortals upon earth.

Lecty, Europ. Moral, II. 247.

4. Pompous, high-sounding verbiage in speech or writing; stilted oratory.

Many of the finest passages in his [Milton's] controversial writings are sometimes spoken of, even by favourable judges, as declamation.

J. A. St. John.

Loose declamation may deceive the crowd.

Sturm, Advice to a Young Lawyer.

declamator (dek-lā-mā-tōr), n. [= F. déclamateur = Sp. Pg. declamador = It. declamatore, < L. declamator, < declamare, declaim.] A declaimer.

Who could, I say, hear this generous declamator without being fir'd at his noble zeal?

Steele, Tatler, No. 58.

declamatory (dē-klām'ā-tō-rī), a. [= F. déclamatoire = Sp. Pg. It. declamatorio, < L. declamatorius, declamatory, < declamare, declaim: see declaim.] 1. Pertaining to the practice of declaiming in oratory or music; having the character of declamation.

The public will enter no protest if the gape between them are filled up with the declamatory odds and ends, provided something on the stage be more or less occupying their attention.

Wagner and Wagnerism, Nineteenth Century, March, 1863.

2. Merely rhetorical; stilted; straining after effect: as, a declamatory style.

That perfection of tone which can be eloquent without being declamatory.

Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 155.

declarable (dē-klār'ā-bəl), a. [= F. déclarable, < declare + -able.] Capable of being declared or proved.

What slender opinions the ancients held of the efficacy of this star is declarable from their compute.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 12.

declarant (dē-klār'ant), n. [F. déclarant, < L. declarant (-is), ppr. of declarare: see declare.] One who makes a declaration; specifically, in law, one whose admission or statement, made in writing or orally at some former time, is sought to be offered in evidence. Such declarations, even though made by a stranger to the litigation, are received in several classes of cases: as, for instance, to prove a fact of pedigree, or when made in the course of duty by a person since deceased, or against the interest of the declarant.

The acknowledgment of payment was held to be "against the declarant's interest," and rendered the whole statement admissible.

Briggs, Br., VIII. 761.

declaration (dek-lā-rā'shon), n. [ME. declaracion = D. declaratio = G. declaration = Dan. declaration, < OF. déclaration, F. déclaration = Sp. declaración = Pg. declaração = It. dichiarazione, < L. declaratio (-n-), a declaration, < declarare, declare: see declare.] 1. A clearing up; that which makes plain; explanation.

Of this forebode shale, fro the cross-tyne unto the verre angle, is elap'd vmbra verba, and the nother parte is elap'd the vmbra rocta. And for the more declaration, loo here the figure.

Chaucer.

2. A positive or formal statement in regard to anything; affirmation; explicit assertion; avowal; publication; proclamation.

His promises are nothing else but declarations what God will do for the good of man.

Newton, Reason, Folly.

To set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us. Acts i. 1.

8. That which is proclaimed or declared; especially, the document or instrument by which an announcement or assertion is formally made: as, the Declaration of Independence.

Verde I wold the declaration.

Rom. of Parmenter (R. E. T. A.), i. 302.

4. In law: (a) At common law, the pleading in which the plaintiff formally presents the allegations on which he bases his claim for relief in a civil action: now more commonly called complaint. (b) In the criminal law of Scotland, the account which a prisoner who has been apprehended on suspicion of having committed a crime gives of himself, to be taken down in writing, on his examination.—5. A confession of faith or doctrine: as, the Auburn Declaration; the Savoy Declaration, etc.—Declaration de fallite, in French law, an adjudication in bankruptcy.—Declaration of Independence, in U. S. hist., the public act by which the Continental Congress, on July 4th, 1776, declared the colonies to be free and independent of Great Britain: often called by eminence the Declaration.—Declaration of intention, in law, a declaration made in court by an alien of his intent to become a citizen of the United States: required in some States as a condition of acquiring land.—Declaration of rights, See Bill of Rights, under bill.—Declaration of title Act, an English statute of 1802 providing means to establish and quiet land titles.—Declaration of trust, an avowal of holding specified property in trust for another person.—Declaration of war, an announcement or proclamation of war by the sovereign authority of a country against another country. It was formerly customary to send a declaration of warlike purpose to the menaced power before beginning hostilities; but a declaration of war is now more commonly merely an announcement of the actual existence of a state of war. In most countries the power of declaring or formally beginning war rests with the sovereign or executive, but the Constitution of the United States confides this power to Congress.—Dying declaration, in law, a declaration made by a person on his death-bed. Such declarations, when relating to the cause of death, are admitted as evidence in a prosecution for homicide where it can be proved that the declarant knew he was about to die and had given up all hope of recovery.—Explicit declaration. See explicit.—Judicial declaration, in Scots law, in civil cases, the statement taken down in writing of a party when judicially examined as to the particular facts on which a case rests.—Savoy Declaration, a "declaration of the faith and order owned and practised in the Congregational churches in England," agreed upon at a meeting in the Savoy palace, London, in 1662. Doctrinally, it is a modification of the Westminster Assembly's Confession of Faith. It is no longer regarded as authoritative among the churches of the Congregational faith and order. Also called Savoy Confession.—To emit a declaration. See emit.

declinative (dē-klar'g-tiv), a. [Fr. déclaratif = Sp. Pg. declarativo = It. dichiarativo, < L. declarare, to declare, to declare: see declare.] 1. Making declaration, proclamation, or publication; exhibiting or manifesting; declaratory; explanatory.

We but rarely find examples of this imperfect subjunctive in the independent declarative form.

I return'd in the evening with Sir Joseph Williamson, now deputy Secretary of State.

Sveign, Diary, July 22, 1674

4. To assert; affirm: as, he declares the story to be false.

He says some of the best things in the world -- and declares that wit is his aversion.

Lamb, My Relations.

5. In law, to solemnly assert a fact before witnesses: as, he declared a paper signed by him to be his last will and testament.—6. To make a full statement of, as of goods on which duty is to be paid at the custom-house.

A merchant of that guild cannot declare at the custom-house merchandise brought in one ship-load or land conveyance of higher value than £3000.

Brougham

To declare a dividend. See dividend.—To declare one's self to throw off reserve and avow one's opinions, show openly what one thinks, or which side one espouses.

We are a considerable body, who, upon a proper occasion, would not fail to declare ourselves.

Addison

To declare war, to make a declaration of war (which see, under declaration) = FR. 2-4. Proclaim, publish, etc. (see announce). Afirm, avow, etc. (see assert); state, protest, utter, promulgate.

II. intrans. 1. To make known one's thoughts or opinions; proclaim or avow some opinion, purpose, or resolution in favor or in opposition; make known explicitly some determination; make a declaration; come out: with for or against: as, the prince declared for the allies; victory had not declared for either party; the allied powers declared against France.

The internal faculties of will and understanding decreeing and declaring against them

Jer. Taylor

Like fawning courtiers, for success they wait;
And then come sniffling, and declare for fate.

Dryden

Specifically.—2. To express a formal decision; make a decision known by official proclamation or notice.

declasé (dē-klā-sé'), a. [Fr.: see declassified.] Same as declassified.

It is only the declasé, the ne or do well, or the really unfortunate, who has nothing to call his own.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 227.

declasé (dē-klā-sé'), a. [< de + class + -é, after F. déclassé (also used in E. as a noun).] Fallen or put out of one's proper class or place or any definite and recognized position or rank in the social system: applied to persons who by misfortune or their own fault have lost social or business standing, and are not counted as part of any recognized class of society.

declension (dē-klēn'shən), n. [An accom. form (term. after extension, etc.) of OF. declinaison (F. declinaison), the same word as declination, declinacion, F. declination, E. declination, < L. declinatio (n.), a bending aside, inflection, declension, < declinare, bend, decline: see decline and declination.] 1. A sloping downward; a declination; a descent; a slope; a declivity.

The declension of the land from that place to the sea.

T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. A sinking or falling into a lower or inferior state; deterioration; decline.

In the latter date and declension of his drooping years.

South, Sermons.

We never read that Jesus laughed, and but once that he rejoiced in spirit; but the declensions of our natures cannot bear the weight of a perpetual grave deportment.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1855), I. 24.

States and empires have their periods of declension.

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 79.

But the fall, the rapid and total declension, of Wilkes's fame, the utter oblivion into which his very name has passed for all purposes save the remembrance of his vices, this affords also a salutary lesson to the followers of the multitude.

Brougham, John Wilkes.

3. Refusal; non-acceptance.

Declension is improperly used to signify the act of declining. It is a good word to express a state of decline or the process of decline. But we cannot say, "He sent in his declension of the office." . . . I do not find it (in this sense) in the works of the first class of English authors. We need a word to express the act in question; we have none but the participle "declining" . . . "Declination" may yet make its way into reputable use.

Philips, Eng. Style, p. 302.

4. In gram.: (a) The inflection of nouns, pronouns, and adjectives; strictly, the deviation of other forms of such a word from that of its nominative case; in general, the formation of the various cases from the stem, or from the nominative singular as representing it: thus, in English, man, man's, men, men's; in Latin, rex, regis, regi, regem, regis, in the singular, and reges, regum, regibus, in the plural. (b) The rehearsing of a word as declined; the act of declining a word, as a noun. (c) A class of nouns declined on the same type: as, first or second declension; the five Latin declensions. Abbreviated decl.—Declension of the needle. See declination.

declensional (dē-klēn'shən-əl), a. [< declension + -al.] In gram., pertaining to or of the nature of declension.

It strenuously avoids the declensional and verbal pabulum usually administered to students.

Pop Sci Mo., XXX. 275.

declericalize (dē-klēr'ī-kal-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. declericalized, ppr. declericalizing. [< depriv. + clerical + -ize.] To deprive of the clerical character; withdraw from clerical influence; secularize. [Rare.]

declinable (dē-klī'nā-bl), a. [Fr. déclinable = Sp. declinable = Pg. declinavel = It. declinabile, < L. declinabilis, < declinare, decline: see decline.] Capable of being declined; specifically, in gram., capable of changing its termination in the oblique cases: as, a declinable noun.

In inflected languages, declinable words . . . usually have endings which not only determine their grammatical class and category, but are also characteristic of the language to which they belong.

G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., vii.

declinal (dē-klī'nāl), a. [< declinare + -al.] 1. Bending downward; declining.—2. In geol., sloping from an axis, as strata of rocks. See declivity.

declinate (dek'il-nāt), a. [L. declinatus, pp. of declinare: see decline.] 1. In bot., bending or bent downward; declining: applied to stamens when they are thrown to one side of a flower, as in Amaryllis; also applied to mosses. Also declined and declinous.—2. In soil., declined; bending or sloping downward; declivous: opposed to acclinate.

declination (dek'il-nā'shon), n. [ME. declinacion, declinacioun = OF. declinacion, declinacion, F. déclinaison and declination = Sp. declinación = Pg. declinação = It. declinazione = D. declination = G. declination = Dan. Sw. deklination, < L. declinatio (n.), a bending aside, deflection, inflection, declension, < declinare, bend, decline: see decline. Cf. declension.] 1. A bending or sloping downward; a sloping or bending from a higher to a lower level; subsidence: as, the declination of the shore.

Like the sun in his evening declination.

Johnson, Rambler.

2. A falling to a lower or inferior condition; deterioration; decline: as, declination in or of vigor, virtue, morals, etc.

Your manhood and courage is always in increase; but our force groweth in declination.

J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, ix.

In our declinations now, every accident is accompanied with heavy clouds of melancholy; and in our youth we never admitted any.

Donne, Letters, lxi.

Many brave men, finding their fortune grow faint, and feeling its declination, have timely withdrawn themselves from great attempts. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., ii. 10.

3. Deviation from a right line; oblique motion.

The declination of atoms in their descent. Bentley.

4. Deviation from the right path or course of conduct: as, a declination from duty.

The declinations from religion, besides the privative, which is atheism, and the branches thereof, are three: heresies, idolatry, and witchcraft.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 379.

5. Aversion; disinclination.

The return of sundry letters into France, signifying the queen's declination from marriage, and the people's unwillingness, to match that way.

Stow, Queen Elizabeth, an. 1581.

6. The act of declining, refusing, or shunning; refusal: as, a declination of an office. [U. S.]—7. In astron., the distance of a heavenly body from the celestial equator, measured on a great circle passing through the pole and also through the body. It is equal to the complement of the polar distance of the body, and is said to be north or south according as the body is north or south of the equator. Great circles passing through the poles, and cutting the equator at right angles, are called circles of declination. Small circles parallel to the celestial equator are termed parallels of declination.

He was that time in Gemini, as I guess,

But lilt to his declinacious

Of Cancer. Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 978.

8. The angle between the magnetic meridian and the geographical meridian of a place.—9. In dialing, the arc of the horizon contained between the vertical plane and the prime vertical circle, if reckoned from east or west, or between the meridian and the plane, if reckoned from north or south.—10. In gram., declension; the inflection of a noun through its various terminations.—Apparent declination. See apparent.—Declination of atoms, or declination of principles [M. L. cinisum principiorum], the slight uncaused swerving aside of atoms from their vertical paths, which was supposed by the ancient Epicureans for the sake of explaining free will and the variety of nature.—Declination of the compass or needle, or magnetic declination, the variation of the magnetic needle from the true meridian of a place. The amount of this variation is found by a declination needle or declinometer (which see). In the northeastern part of the United States the needle points west of north (about 8° W. at New York city in 1885), while in the southern and western portions it points east of north. Further, the declination is now westerly in Europe and Africa and over the Atlantic ocean, while it is easterly for the larger part of North America, South America, the Pacific ocean, and most of Asia. The declination is subject to large secular changes (30° to 60°), embracing a cycle of several centuries; it has been increasing in the eastern United States since the early part of the nineteenth century. See agnetic and isogonic.

declinational (dek'il-nā'shon-al), a. [declination + -al.] Of or pertaining to declination.—Declinational tide, a tide produced by the moon's changes of declination.

declinator (dek'il-nā-tor), n. [= F. déclinateur = Pg. declinator = It. declinatore, < NL. declinator, < L. declinare, decline: see decline and declination.] 1. An instrument used in ascertaining the declination, as in dialing, of a plane, and in astronomy, of the stars. Also declinator.—2. One who declines to join or agree with another; a dissentient.

The votes of the declinators could not be heard for the noise. Rp. Hæbet, Alp. Williams, ii. 65.

declinatory (dē-kli'ng-tō-ri), a. and n. [= F. déclinatorie = Sp. Pg. It. declinatorio, < NL. declinatorius, < L. declinare, decline: see decline.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to declination; characterized by declining; intimating refusal.—Declinatory plea, in old Eng. law, a plea before trial or conviction, intended to show that the party was not liable to the penalty of the law, or was specially exempted from the jurisdiction of the court, such as the plea of benefit of clergy.

II. n.; pl. declinatories (-ris). 1. Same as declinator, 1.—2. An excuse or plea for declining.

This matter came not to the judges to give any opinion; and if it had, they had a declinatory, of course, viz., that matters of Parliament were too high for them.

Roper North, Lord Guilford, ii. 10.

declinature (dē-kli'ng-tūr), n. [*L. as if *declinatura*, < declinare: see decline.] 1. The act of declining or refusing; declension. See extract under declension, 3.

The declinature of that office is no less graceful.

The Scottman (newspaper).

Specifically.—2. In Scots law, the privilege which a party has, in certain circumstances, to decline judicially the jurisdiction of the judge before whom he is cited.

decline (dē-klin'), v.; pret. and pp. declined, ppr. declining. [ME. declinen, declynen (= D. declinieren = G. declinieren = Dan. deklinere = Sw. deklinera), < OF. decliner, F. décliner = Sp. Pg. declinar = It. declinare, declinare, declinare, < L. declinare, bend, turn aside, deflect, inflect, decline, < de, down, + **clinare*, bend, incline, = E. lean: see cune and lean.] I. trans. 1. To cause to bend or slope; bend down; incline; cause to assume an inclined position; depress.

We are in danger of being persuaded that the decline of our own tongue has not only commenced, but has already advanced too far to be averted or even arrested.

G. F. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., i. 2.

4. In med.: (a) That stage of a disease when the characteristic symptoms begin to abate in violence. (b) A popular term for any chronic disease in which the strength and plumpness of the body gradually diminish, until the patient dies: as, he is in a decline. (c) The time of life when the physical and mental powers are failing. Quain.—Syn. 3. Degeneracy, falling off, drooping. declined (dē-klin'd'), p. a. In bot., same as declinate, 1.

decliner (dē-kli'nér), n. 1. One who declines.

He was a staid decliner of honours and titles.

Emlyn, Diary, p. 4.

2. Same as declining dial (which see, under dial).

declinograph (dē-kli'ng-gráf), n. [Irreg. < L. declinare, decline, + Gr. γράφω, write.] An arrangement for recording automatically the observation of declination with a filar micrometer.

declinometer (dek'il-nom'ō-tér), n. [Irreg. < L. declinare, decline, + Gr. μέτρον, a measure.]

An instrument for measuring the declination of the magnetic needle, and for observing its variations. In magnetic observatories there are permanent instruments of this kind, and they are commonly made self-registering by photographic means. It is the object of such instruments to register the small hourly and annual variations in declination, and also the variations due to magnetic storms.

declinuous (dē-kli'nuš), a. [< L. declivus, adj. (< declinare, bend down: see declinate), + E. -ous.] In bot., same as declinate, 1.

declivant (dē-kli-vant), a. [As declive + -ant.] Same as declinant.

declivate (dē-kli-vāt), a. [< declive + -ate.] In entom., gently sloping; forming an angle of less than 45° with some surface.

declive (dē-kli-v), a. and s. [< F. décline, < L. declivus, sloping: see declivity.] 1. a. Inclining downward: in surg., applied to the most dependent portion of a tumor or abscess.

II. s. In anat., the posterior portion of the monticulus of the vermis superior of the cerebellum.

declivent (dē-kli-vēnt), a. [Var. of declinate.] Bent downward; sloping gently away from the general surface or the part behind: specifically used in entomology: as, the sides of the elytra are declivent.

declivitous (dē-kli-vi'tus), a. [< declivity + -ous.] Same as declivous.

declivity (dē-kli-vi'ti), n.; pl. declivities (-tis). [*< F. déclivité = Sp. declividad = Pg. declividade = It. declività, < L. declivitas (-is), a slope, declivity, < declivus, sloping, < de, down, + clivus, a slope, hill, < *cliv-nare, slope, bend down: see decline. Cf. acclivity, proclivity.*] A downward slope. Specifically—(a) The portion of a hill or range of mountains lying on one side or the other of the crest or axial.

It (the Ural) consists, along its western declivity, of the older paleozoic rocks. Sir J. H. Verch.

The Pyrenees made then, as they make now, no very serious difference between the languages spoken on their opposite declivities. Tschirner, Nippon, Lit., I. 277.

(b) In entom., a part gently sloping away from the general plane of a surface. Declivity of the metathorax, a sloping or perpendicular portion of the metathorax over the base of the alula.

declivous (dē-kli-vus), a. [< L. declivus, sloping (see declivity), + E. -ous.] Sloping downward; having the character of a declivity; declivate: specifically, in zool., said of parts which slope gently downward: as, a declivous mesosternum. Also, rarely, declivitous.

decoct (dē-kokt'), v. t. [< ME. decocten, < L. decoctus, pp. of decoquere, boil down, < de, down, + coquere, cook: see cook.] 1. To prepare by boiling; digest in hot or boiling water; extract the strength or flavor of by boiling.

Holy thistle decocted in clear posnet drink was heretofore much used at the beginnings of agues. Boyle, Works, VI. 571.

2. To digest in the stomach.

There she decocts, and dith the food prepare;
Then she distributes it to every vein;
Then she expels what she may fitly spare. Sir J. Daines, Immortal of Soul.

34. To warm as if by boiling; heat up; excite.

Can sudden water,
A drench for sur-rein'd faden, their barley-broth, Decoct their cold blood to such vallant heat? Shak., Hen. V., III. 6.

4. To concoct; devise.

What villanie are they decocting now?
Meriton, Antonio and Melinda, II., iv. 2.

decoct (dē-kokt'), a. [ME., < L. decoctus, pp.: see the verb.] Cooked; digested.

Barty seeds, or pulps decoct and colds.

decoctible (dē-kok-ti-bl), a. [< decoct + -ible.] That may be boiled or digested.

decoction (dē-kok-shən), n. [< ME. decoctioun, < OF. decoction, F. decoction = Sp. decocción = Pg. decoção = It. decozione, < L. decoctio (-n-), a decoction, a boiling down, < decoctus, pp. of decoquere: see decoct.] 1. The act of boiling in water, in order to extract the peculiar properties or virtues.

If after a decoction of herbs in a winter-night we expose the liquor to the frigid air, we may observe in the morning under a crust of ice the perfect appearance . . . of the plants that were taken from it. Gosse, Vanity of Dogmatizing, v.

2. The liquor in which an animal or a vegetable substance has been boiled; water impregnated by boiling with the properties of such a substance: as, a decoction of Peruvian bark.

If a plant be boiled in water, the strained liquor is called the decoction of the plant. Art. pharm.

decoctive (dē-kok-tiv), a. Having power to decoct. [Rare.]

decocture (dē-kok-tūr), n. [*< L. as if *decoctura, < decoctus, pp.: see decoct.*] A substance prepared by decoction. [Rare.]

decoit (de-koit'), n. An erroneous spelling of dakot.

decoll, v. t. [< OF. decoller, F. décoller = Sp. decollar = Pg. degolar = It. decollare, < L. decollare, behead, < de, from, + collum, neck: see collar.] To behead.

A speedy public dethroning and decolling of the king. Parliamentary Hist., an. 1643.

decollate (dē-kol-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. decollated, ppr. decollating. [< L. decollatus, pp. of decollare, behead: see decoll.] To behead.

He brought forth a statue with three heads: two of them were quite best off, and the third was much bruised, but not decollated.

Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels (1635), p. 474.

All five to-day have suffered death
With no distinction save in dying—he Decollated by way of privilege,
The rest hanged decently and in order. Browning, Ring and Book, II. 314.

decollate (dē-kol-ā-ted), p. a. Beheaded; specifically, in conch., applied to those univalve shells which have the apex worn off in the progress of growth. This happens constantly with some shells, such as a species of Bulimus, which is called in consequence B. decollatus.

decollation (dē-kol-lā-shən), n. [< ME. decollacion, < OF. decollation, F. décollation = Sp. degollacion, decollacion = Pg. degolagão = It. decollazione, < L. decollatio (-n-), < decollare, behead: see decoll, decollate.] 1. The act of beheading; decapitation; the state of one beheaded.

Their decollations and flagellations are quite sickening in detail, and distinguished from the tidy, decorous executions of the early Italians. Contemporary Rev., LI. 523.

Specifically—2. In surg., the removal of the head of the child in cases of difficult parturition.—Decollation of St. John the Baptist, a festival celebrated on the 29th day of August in both the Eastern and the Western Church, in memory of the decapitation of St. John the Baptist. It is entered under the same date in the calendar of the English prayer-book in the words, "St. John the Baptist, beheaded."

decollé (dē-kol-ē-tā'), a. [< F., pp. of décoller, bare one's neck and shoulders, < dé, < L. de, off, down, + coll, col, < L. collum, neck.] (a) Low-necked: said of a dress-waist so shaped as to leave the neck and shoulders exposed. (b) [Fem. décollée.] By extension, having the neck and shoulders exposed: said of a woman the waist of whose dress is cut low in the neck. decolor, decolour (dē-kul-gr), v. t. [= F. décolorer, < L. decolorare, deprive of color, < de, from, + color, color: see color, and cf. discolor.] To deprive of color; bleach.

The antiputrescent and decoloring properties of charcoal. Ure, Dict., I. 415.

decolorant (dē-kul-gr-ant), a. and s. [< L. decolorant (-s), ppr. of decolorare: see decolor.] 1. a. Having the property of removing color; bleaching.

Alcohol . . . is volatile, inflammable, and decolorant. Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 112.

II. s. A substance which bleaches or removes color.

decolorate (dē-kul-gr-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. decolorated, ppr. decolorating. [< L. decoloratus, pp. of decolorare, deprive of color: see decolor.] To deprive of color; decolor; bleach; blanch.

decolorate (dē-kul-gr-āt), a. [< L. decoloratus, pp.: see the verb.] Deprived of color; bleached.

decoloration (dē-kul-gr-ā-shən), n. [= F. décoloration = Sp. decoloración = Pg. decoloração, < L. decoloratio (-n-), < decolorare, deprive of color: see decolor.] 1. The act or process of decoloring or depriving of color.—2. Absence of color; colorlessness.

Decoloration, a term . . . signifying blanching or loss of the natural colour of any object. Heeper, Med. Dict.

decolorimeter (dē-kul-grim-ē-tēr), n. [= F. décolorimètre, < L. decolor, adj., deprived of color, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] 1. An instrument for measuring the effects of bleaching-powder.—2. A graduated tube containing a solution of indigo and molasses, used to test the power of charcoal in a divided state in decolorizing solutions.

decolorization (dē-kul-gr-i-zā-shən), n. [< decolorize + -ation.] The act or process of depriving of color; the process of bleaching or decoloring. Also spelled decolorisation, decolorization, decolorisation.

decolorize (dē-kul-gr-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. decolorized, ppr. decolorizing. [< de- priv. + color + -ize. Cf. decolorate.] To deprive of color; bleach. Also spelled decolorise, decolorise, decolorise.

The syrup is then whitened or decolorized by filtering it through a bed of coarsely powdered animal charcoal.

J. H. Nichols, Fireside Science, p. 29.

decoloriser (dē-kul-gr-i-zér), n. That which decolorizes.

The different coloring-matters are retained in different degrees of intensity in the tissues or cell elements, in the presence of the individual groups of decolorizers, such as alcohol, acetic acid, and glycerine.

Huappe, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 48.

decolour, decolourization, etc. See decolor, etc.

decomplex (dē-kom-plēks), a. [< de- + complex.] Repeatedly compound; made up of complex constituents.

Now the plethoric form of period, this monster model of sentence, bloated with decomplex intercalations, . . . is the prevailing model in newspaper eloquence. De Quincey, Style, I.

Decomplex idea. See idea.

decomposability (dē-kom-pō-zā-bil-i-ti), n. [< decomposable: see -bility.] Capability of being decomposed; the quality of being decomposable.

The ready decomposability of vermilion . . . cannot be removed by boiling in potash. Ure, Dict., IV. 281.

decomposable (dē-kom-pō-zā-bl), a. [= F. décomposable; as decompose + -able.] Capable of being decomposed or resolved into constituent primary elements.

Manifestly decomposable states of consciousness cannot exist before the states of consciousness out of which they are composed. H. Spencer, Education, p. 120.

decompose (dē-kom-pōs'), v.; pret. and pp. decomposed, ppr. decomposing. [= F. décomposer; as de- priv. + composer; cf. decompose.] 1. trans. To separate into its constituent parts; resolve into its original elements; specifically, to reduce (an organic body) to a state of dissolution by a process of natural decay.

In some preliminary experiments it was found difficult to completely decompose cuprous oxide after it had been dried. Amer. Jour. Sci., Whole No. CXXI, p. 54.

Whatever be the origin of the electricity, the quantity of water decomposed is proportional to the quantity of electricity which passes. Aitken, tr. of Mascart and Joubert, I. 242.

Decomposing furnace. See furnace.

II. intrans. To become resolved into constituent elements; specifically, to decay; rot; putrefy.—Byn. Decay, Putrefy, etc. See rot.

decomposed (dē-kom-pōsd'), p. a. 1. In a state of decomposition.—2. In ornith., separated: specifically said of a feather the web of which is decomposed by disconnection of the barbs, or of a bundle of feathers, as those of the crest, which stand or fall apart from one another: used like decomposed in botany.

decomposer (dē-kom-pō-sér), n. That which decomposes.

The cinabar may be brought into intimate contact with its decomposer. Ure, Dict., III. 226.

decomposite (dē-kom-pōs-it), a. and n. [< L. decompositus, formed from a compound, < de- + composui, compound, composite: see composite.] 1. a. 1. Compounded a second time; compounded with things already composite.—2. In bot., same as decomposed.

II. n. Anything compounded of composite things.

Decomposites of three metals, or more, are too long to inquire of. Bacon, Questions Touching Metals.

Compounds wherein one element is compound are called decomposites. . . The decomposite character of such words [as midshipman, gentlemanlike] is often concealed or disguised. Latham, Eng. Lang., § 422.

decomposition (dē-kom-pō-si-shən), n. [*< F. décomposition = Sp. descomposición = Pg. decomposição = It. decomposizione, < NL. *decompositio (-n-), < decomponere, decompose: see decompose, decompose.*] 1. The act or process of separating the constituent elements of a compound body or substance; analysis; resolution; specifically, the process of reducing an organic body to a state of decay or putrefaction.

Having obtained oxygen and hydrogen by the decomposition of water, it may naturally be inquired whether these substances cannot in turn be decomposed. To this question it can be simply replied that the most skillful chemists have hitherto failed to effect such decomposition. Huxley, Physiology, p. 105.

2. The state of being decomposed or resolved; release from previous combinations; disintegration; specifically, decay of an organic body.

The new continents are built out of the ruins of an old planet; the new races fed out of the decomposition of the foregoing.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 274.

The latter half of the nineteenth century will be known to the future historian as especially the era of the decomposition of orthodoxies.

J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 203.

3. [With ref. to decompositio, q. v.] The act of compounding together things which are themselves compound; a combination of compounds.

A dextrous decomposition of two or three words together.

Instruct. Concerning Oratory.

Chemical decomposition. See chemical. Decomposition of forces, in meek, same as resolution of forces (which see, under force).—Decomposition of light, the separation of a beam of light into its prismatic colors.

decompound (dē-kom-poun'd), v. t. [= Sp. decompone = It. decomporre, < *NL. *decomponere*, < L. de-priv. (in def. 2, de- intensive) + componere, put together, compound; see de- and compound, and cf. decompose.] 1. To decompose. [Rare.]

It divides and compounds objects into a thousand curious parts.

Hazlitt.

2. To compound a second time; compound or form out of that which is already compound; form by a second composition.

All our complex ideas whatsoever . . . however compounded and decomposed, may at last be resolved into simple ideas.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. 22.

decompound (dē-kom-poun'd), a. [de- + compound, a.: see decompound, v., and cf. decompose.] 1. Composed of things which are themselves compound; compounded a second time.

—2. In bot., divided into a number of compound divisions, as a leaf or panicle; repeatedly cleft or cut into an indefinite number of unequal segments.

A decompound leaf is one in which the primary petiole gives off subsidiary petioles, each supporting a compound leaf.

Also decompound.

decompound (dē-kom-poun'd), n. A decompound (which see).

decompoundable (dē-kom-poun'd-a-bl), a. [decompound + -able.] Capable of being decompound.

decompoundly (dē-kom-poun'd-li), adv. In a decompound manner.

decompt, n. [OF. descompt, account, back reckoning, < descompter, account for, account back; see discount and count.] Deduction or percentage held as security.

deconcentrate (dē-kon-sen-trāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. deconcentrated, ppr. deconcentrating. [de-priv. + concentrate.] To spread or scatter from a point or center; destroy the concentration of, as of bodies of troops.

Times (London).

deconcentration (dē-kon-sen-trā'shon), n. [deconcentrate + -ion.] The act of deconcentrating, or of dispersing whatever has been concentrated in one place or point: the opposite of concentration.

deconcoct (dē-kon-kok't), v. t. [de- + coact.] To decompose or resolve.

Since these Benedictines have had their cruditie deconcocted.

Fuller, Ch. Hist., VI. 207.

deconsecrate (dē-kon-sē-kra't), v. t.; pret. and pp. deconsecrated, ppr. deconsecrating. [de- + consecrate, cf. F. déconsecrer.] To deprive of the character conferred by consecration; secularize.

Though it was possible to sweep the idols out of the Kaaba, it was not so easy to deconsecrate the spot, but far more convenient to give it a new sanction.

Encyc. Brit., XIX. 98.

deconsecration (dē-kon-sē-kra'shon), n. [deconsecrate + -ion.] The act of deconsecrating or of depriving of sacred character; specifically, the ceremony employed in deconsecrating or rendering secular anything consecrated, as a church or a cemetery. The forms to be observed do not appear in the prayer-book, and the ceremony is of very rare occurrence.

decontumace capiendo (dē kon-tā-mā's kapi-en'd), [L. (NL.): L. de, of; contumace, abl. of contumax, contumacious; capiendo, abl. ger. of capere, take; see capacious, capias, etc.] In

Eng. law, a writ issuing out of chancery, on the suggestion of an ecclesiastical court, to attach a party to a proceeding in the latter court for contempt of its authority: a procedure substituted by the act of 53 Geo. III., c. 127, for the de excommunication capiendo.

decopet, p. a. [*ME. pp. of *decopen*, < OF. decoper, decopper, F. decouper, cut, slash, < de- + couper, cut; see compel.] Slashed; cut in figures.

Shode he was with grette malstrie
With shoon decopet, and with lass [lace].

Rom. of the Rose, l. 843.

decopperization (dē-kop-er-i-zā'shon), n. [de- + copperize + -ation.] The process of removing copper or freeing from copper.

decopperize (dē-kop-er-i-zē), v. t.; pret. and pp. decopperized, ppr. decopperizing. [L. de, of, from, + copper + -ize.] To free from copper.

The sine remaining in the decopperized lead is oxidized in a reverberatory furnace.

Ure, Dict., III. 71.

decorament (dek'ō-rā-ment), n. [L. decoramentum: see decorament.] Same as decorament.

decorate (dek'ō-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. decorated, ppr. decorating. [L. decoratus, pp. of decorare = D. decorer = Sp. Pg. decorar = It. decorare = D. decoreren = G. decorieren = Dan. dekorere = Sw. dekorera], adorn, distinguish, honor, < decus (decōr), ornament, grace, dignity, honor, akin to decor, elegance, grace, beauty, ornament, < decere, become, befit, whence ult. decent, q. v.] 1. To distinguish; grace; honor.

My harts was fully sette, and my minde deliberately determined to have decorated this realm with wholesome laws, statutes, and ordinances.

Hall, Kiv. IV., an. 23.

2. To deck with something becoming or ornamental; adorn; beautify; embellish: as, to decorate the person; to decorate an edifice.

A grave and forcible argument, decorated by the most brilliant wit and fancy.

Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

With lupin and with lavender,
To decorate the fading year.

D. M. Moor, Birth of the Flower.

3. To confer distinction upon by means of a badge or medal of honor: as, to decorate an artist with the cross of the Legion of Honor.

—Syn. 2. Adorn, Ornament, Decorate, etc. (see adorn), bedizen, glit, trick out, emblemize.

decorated (dek'ō-rā-ted), p. a. Adorned; ornamented; embellished.—Decorated style, in arch., the second style of English Pointed architecture, in use from the end of the thirteenth to the beginning of the fifteenth century, when it degenerated into the Perpendicular.

It is distinguished from the earlier Pointed style, from which it was developed, by the more flowing lines of its tracery, especially of its windows, by the more intricate and less conventional combinations of its foliage, by the greater elaboration of its capitals, moldings, finials, etc., and generally by a style of ornamentation more naturalistic and as a rule less in accordance with true artistic principles. The Decorated style has been divided into two periods: namely, the Early or Geometric Decorated period, in which the ornament consists especially of simple curves and lines and combinations of them; and the Decorated style proper, in which the peculiar characteristics of the style are most emphasized, and meager or involved arrangement of lines in ornament takes the place of the broad treatment of masses which characterizes earlier medieval work.

decoration (dek'ō-rā'shon), n. [= F. décoration = Sp. decoración = Pg. decoração = It. decorazione = D. decoratio = G. decoratie = Dan. Sw. dekoratie, < ML. decoratio (a-), < L. decorare, decorate; see decorate.] 1. The act of decorating or adorning with something becoming or ornamental; the art of adorning, ornamenting, or embellishing.

We know that decoration is not architectural decoration unless it emphasizes construction.

The Century, XXI. 544.

Decorated Architecture of the period of transition to the later Decorated style.—Tomb of Bishop Bridport, Salisbury Cathedral, Eng. land.

2. The conferring of a badge, as of an order, or a medal of honor; hence, the badge or medal conferred.—3. That which embellishes; anything which decorates or adorns; an ornament.

Our church did even then exceed the Romish in ceremonies and decorations.

Marcell, Works, II. 208.

It is a rule, without any exception, in all kinds of composition, that the principal idea, the predominant feeling, should never be confounded with the accompanying decorations.

Macaulay, Petrarch.

4. In music, a general term for the various melodic embellishments, as the trill, the appoggiatura, etc.—5. In pyrotechny, the compositions placed in port-fires, rockets, paper shells, etc., to make a brilliant display when the case is exploded.—Castellan decoration, in ceram., the system of decoration by means of a point producing scratches through an exterior thin layer of color, revealing the color of the body beneath: so called from the asserted origin of this decoration at Città di Castello, in Umbria, Italy. (Compare graffito—Decorazione day, the day set apart in the United States for observances in memory of the soldiers and sailors who fell in the civil war of 1861–65: originally called Memorial day. The day is observed by processions and orations in honor of the dead, and particularly by decorating their graves with flowers. Originally different days were selected for this purpose in the different States; but usage has now settled upon May 30th, which has been made a legal holiday in most of the States. The custom is observed both in the North and in the South.—Embroidery decoration, in ceram., a name given to a surface-decoration similar to that called lace-decoration, but more massive, and usually in white on a dark ground.—Porcellana decoration, in ceram., decoration by means of blue leafage, scrolls, and the like, on a white ground, as if in imitation of Oriental porcelain: especially applied to Italian majolica so decorated.—Trophy decoration, decoration by means of groups of arms, musical instruments, scrolls, tools of painting and sculpture, and the like, or what may by extension be called trophies, especially in Italian decorative art.—Syn. 3. Embellishment, furniture, trapping.

decorative (dek'ō-rā-tiv), a. [decorate + -ive.] 1. Of or pertaining to decoration; concerned with decoration: as, decorative art.

Small objects which are attractive in colour and shape will naturally be used by the savage for decorative purposes.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 413.

2. Of an ornamental nature; decorating; embellishing.

The great choir-window of Lichfield is the noblest glass-work I remember to have seen. I have met nowhere colors so chaste and grave, and yet so rich and true, or a cluster of designs so plausibly decorative, and yet so pictorial.

H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 24.

Decorative art. See art. Decorative notes, in music, short notes added to the essential notes of a melody by way of embellishment.

decorativeness (dek'ō-rā-tiv-nes), n. The quality of being decorative.

decorator (dek'ō-rā-tor), n. [F. décorateur = Sp. Pg. decorador = D. decorateur = Dan. dekoratør, < ML. decorator, < L. decorare, decorate; see decorate.] One who decorates or embellishes; specifically, one whose business is the decoration of dwellings or public edifices.

They are careful decorators of their persons.

Sir S. Raffles, Hist. Java.

decote (dē-kōr'), v. t. [OF. decorer, F. décorer, < L. decorare, decorate; see decorate.] To decorate; adorn; distinguish.

This made me to esteem of her the more,
Her name and rareness did her so decore.

K. James V., Chron. 8 P., III. 670 (Jamieson).

To decore and beautify the house of God.

decorament (dē-kōr-ment), n. [See decoriment, < OF. decorament, F. décorément, < L. decoramentum, ornament, < L. decorare, decorate. Cf. decorament.] Decoration.

The police and decoriment of this realm.

Acts James VI., 1587 (ed. 1814), p. 508.

These decoriments which beautify and adorn her.

Heywood, Description of a Ship, p. 20.

decorous (dē-kō'- or dek'ō-ras), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. decoroso (also decoro), < L. decorus, seemly, becoming, befitting, < decor (decōr), seemliness, grace, etc.: see decorate and decorum.] Characterized by or conspicuous for decorum; proper; decent; especially (of persons), formally polite and proper in speech and conduct.

There is no ducena so rigidly prudent, and inexorably decorous, as a superannuated coquette.

Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 198.

He recited a list of complaints against his majesty . . . all of them fabricated or exaggerated for the occasion, and none of them furnishing even a decorous pretext for the war which was now formally declared.

Melley, Dutch Republic, I. 168.

He [Sir Robert Peel] was uniformly decorous, and had a high sense of dignity and propriety.

W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 218.

—Syn. Fit, seemly, comely, orderly, appropriate.

decorously (dē-kō'- or dek'ō-ras-li), adv. In a decorous manner; with decorum.

*Salisbury's Countess, she would not die,
As a proud dame should, deceitfully;
Lifting my axe, I split her skull,
And the edge since then has been notched and dull.
Trials of Charles I. and the Royalists, N. and Q., 7th ser., [IV. 444.]*

deceitfulness (dē-kō'-or dek'-rue-ness), n. Deceit or propensity of behavior.
deceitful (dē-kōr'-ti-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. deceitfully, pp. deceitfulness. [< L. decorticare, pp. of decorticare > Pg. decorticare = F. decortiquer; cf. It. decorticare, decorticare, with prefix de-, and Sp. decorticar = Pg. decorticar = Oll. decorticare, from a deriv. form of the noun, strip the bark off, < de, from, + cortice (cortice), bark, whence ult. E. cork: see cork<sup>1</sup>, cortice.] To remove the bark from; in general, to deprive of the cortex, in any sense of that word; strip off the exterior coat of.
Great barley, dried and decorticated.

Great barley, dried and decorticated.

decorticator (dē-kōr'-ti-kā-tor), n. A tool for stripping off bark.
Great barley, dried and decorticated.

decorum (dē-kōr'-um), n. [= F. decorum = Sp. Pg. It. decoro, < L. decorum, fitness, propriety, decorum, neut. of decorus, fit, proper: see decorous.] 1. Propriety of speech, behavior, or dress; formal politeness; orderliness; seemliness; decency.
The true Measure of Decorum . . . is that which is most serviceable to the principal End Brilliantfort, Sermons, III. 12.

He kept with princely due decorum,
Yet never stood in awe before 'em. Swift.
Where there is any dependency among one another, they observe a great decorum, all rising up when a superior comes in. Pucke, Description of the East, I. 182
A first rate beauty never studied the decorum of dress with more assiduity.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, civ.

2. In general, fitness, suitability, or propriety of anything, with respect to occasion, purpose, or use.

déouplé (dā-kō-plā'), a. [F., pp. of découpler, uncouple, < de- priv. + coupler, couple.] In her., uncoupled; parted into two: said especially of a chevron when the two rafters are separated by a slight space.

decours (de-kōr'), a. and n. [< OF. decours, a running down, course, wane, decrees, F. décour, wane, decrease, < L. decursus, a running down, descent, < decurrere, run down: see decur.] In her., same as decreased (a).

decourt (dē-kōrt'), v. t. [< de- priv. + court.] To drive or dismiss from court; deprive of court influence.

decoy (dē-koi'), v. [< de- + coy<sup>1</sup>, v., entice, allure: see de- and coy<sup>1</sup>.] The birds decoyed and the decoying birds being commonly ducks, the word decoy, esp. as a noun, was soon turned by popular etymology into duckoy. Hence the spelling duckoy, and finally the compound duck-coy, which, though thus developed from decoy, may be considered as made up of duck + coy, n., also used in sense of decoy. The D. words, cenden-koot, formerly cende-koot, a 'duck-coy' (D. cend = A.S. cand, a duck: see drake and anas), koot-cend, a 'coy-duck', koot-man, a decoyman, soget-koot, a bird-rage, a decoy, are compounded with D. koot, a cage, a bird-cage, a fold, hive (the source of E. coy<sup>2</sup>, q. v., but not connected with E. coy<sup>1</sup> or decoy), either independently of the accidentally similar E. words, or in imitation of them.] 1. trans. To lure into a snare; entrap by some allurements or deception: as, to decoy ducks within gunshot; troops may be decoyed into an ambush.
I have heard of barbarians who, when tempests drive ships upon their coasts, decoy them to the rocks that they may plunder their landing. Johnson.

2. To allure, attract, or entice, without notion of entrapping.
The king might be decoyed from thence.
Clarendon, Civil War, III. 232.

—Byn. Allure, Lure, Seduce (see allure); to snare, tempt, mislead.

3. trans. To be deceived by a decoy; fall into a snare.
They [ducks] are quite unsuspecting of man, and, decoying well, are shot in extraordinary numbers.

decoy (dē-koi'), n. [< decoy, v.] 1. A lure employed to entice game into a snare or within the range of a weapon; specifically, an image of a bird, as a duck, or a trained living bird or animal, used to lure wild birds or animals into the power of man; hence, also, a person similarly employed with respect to other persons. Hence—2. Anything intended to lead into a snare; any lure or allurements that deceives and misleads into evil, danger, or the power of an enemy; a stratagem employed to mislead or lead into danger.—3. A place, as a pond, furnished with an arrangement for luring wild fowl into it. Several channels or pipes of a curved form, covered with light hooped network, lead from the pond in various directions. The wild fowl are enticed to enter the wide mouth of the channel by tamed ducks trained for the purpose, or by grain scattered on the water. When they are well within the covered channel they are driven up into the funnel-net at the far end, where they are easily caught.

decoy-bird (dē-koi'-bērd), n. A bird, or an imitation of one, used as a lure to entice others into a net or within gunshot.

decoy-duck (dē-koi'-duk), n. 1. In foxing, a duck, or an imitation of one, used as a decoy.—2. A person acting as a decoy for other persons.

Admit no . . . Decoy-Duck to wheedle you a top-scrambling to the Play in a Mask.
Congress, Way of the World, iv. 5.

decrassify (dē-kras'-i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. decrassified, pp. decrassifying. [< L. de- priv. + crassus, thick, + -fy.] To make less crass.

I might at least
Eliminate, decrassify my faith,
Since I adopt it, keeping what I must,
And leaving what I can.
Browning, Bishop Blougram's Apology.

decrease (dē-kres'), v. t.; pret. and pp. decreased, pp. decreasing. [< ME. decrasen, decrocon, < OF. decresser, decroistre, decroistre, decroistre, F. décroître = Sp. decrecer = Pg. decrecer = It. decrescere (cf., with altered prefix, ME. decrescen, < OF. decresceire, decroistre = Pr. decrescer = Sp. decrescer = It. decrescere, < ML. decrescere), < L. decrescere, decrease, become less, wane, < de, from, away, + crescere, grow: see crescent. Cf. crasse<sup>2</sup>, decrease, increase.] 1. trans. To become less; lessen; be diminished gradually in extent, bulk, quantity, or amount, or in strength, influence, or excellence: as, the days decrease in length from June to December.
Olyves now and o'er'n tree's ichone
Do dounge hem in decreasage of the moone.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. 8.), p. 79
He must increase, but I must decrease. John iii. 30.

Decreasing series. See progression.—Wyn. Decrease, Diminish, Diminute, Contract; to lessen, abate, ebb, subside, fall off, fall away, shrink. The first three all mean a becoming less by degrees. Decrease more often implies that the causes are imperceptible or not necessarily perceptible, acting, it may be, from within the object itself: as, the swelling decreases daily. Diminish generally implies the action of some external cause which is more or less in the mind of those concerned: as, his fortune diminishes daily through extravagance; the troops diminish steadily under disease and conflict. Decrease is the appropriate word for reduction of bulk or volume, diminish for reduction of number. These distinctions are not always observed. To diminish is to become small in size, amount, or number by slow and imperceptible degrees, the reduction being always undesirable and the result a sort of attenuation: as, the army dwindled to a few thousands; the child dwindled to a mere skeleton. To contract is to become less by shrinkage or a drawing together of parts or elements: it implies loss of size, bulk, or extent, without the loss of constituent substance or parts usually expressed by the other words.
So many wives, who have yet their husbands in their arms; so many parents, who have not the number of their children lessened; so many villages, towns, and cities, whose inhabitants are not decreased, their property violated, or their wealth diminished, are yet owing to the sober conduct and happy results of your advice.
Dryden, King Arthur, Dod.

If the activities of a living body involve an expenditure not made good by nutrition, dwindling follows.
H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 53.

The anatomical structure of the eye is such that a moderately contracted pupil is in contact with the lens-surface.
Quain, Med. Dict., p. 480.

II. trans. To make less; lessen; make smaller in dimensions, amount, quality, excellence, etc.; reduce gradually or by small deductions.

Nor cherish'd they relations poor;
That might decrease their present store. Prior.

decrease (dē-kres' or dē-kres'), n. [< ME. decresce, < OF. decresce, decroistre, decroistre, decroistre, < de- priv. + crescere, < L. decrescere, decrease, become less, wane (as applied to the moon): see decrease.] 1. A becoming less; diminution; wane (as applied to the moon); decay: as, a rapid decrease of revenue or of strength.

See in what time the seeds set in the increase of the moon come to a certain height, and how they differ from those that are set in the decrease of the moon.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. The amount by which something is lessened; extent of loss or decrement: as, a great decrease in production or of income.

decreasingly (dē-kres'-ing-lī), adv. In a decreasing manner; by decrease.

decreation (dē-kre'-ā-shon), n. [< de- priv. + creation.] The undoing of an act of creation. [Rare.]

Especially the continual detractum and annihilation of the souls of the brutes.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 45.

decree (dē-kres'), n. [< ME. decree (cf. Sc. decree), < OF. decret, F. décret = Sp. Pg. It. decreto = D. dekreet = G. decret = Dan. Sw. dekret, < L. decretum, a decree, ordinance, decision, neut. of decretus, pp. of decernere, decree, decide (> E. decern): see decern.] 1. A special ordinance or regulation promulgated by civil or other authority; an authoritative decision having the force of law.
He made a decree for the rain. Job xiv. 22.
And statesmen at her council met
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet
By shaping some august decree.
Tennyson, To the Queen.

On December 7, 1895, the Emperor of Brazil issued a decree which opened the Amazon . . . to the commerce of all the world from and after September 7, 1897.
E. Schuyler, Amer. Diplomacy, p. 342.

Specifically—2. In Rom. law, a determination or judgment of the emperor on a suit between parties. Among the Romans, when all legislative power was centered in the emperor, it became the custom to ask for their opinion and decision in disputed cases. Their decisions were called decrees, and formed part of the imperial constitutions.

3. An edict or a law made by an ecclesiastical council for regulating business within its jurisdiction. The term is used in ecclesiastical history chiefly as a designation of certain dogmatic and authoritative decisions on disputed points in theology and discipline in the Roman Catholic Church: as, the Decrees of the Council of Trent, the Decrees of Aulicular Confession by the Fourth Lateran Council.

4. A judicial decision or determination of a litigated cause; specifically, the sentence or order of a court of chancery, or of a court of admiralty or of probate, after a hearing or submission of the cause. The word judgment is now used in reference to the decisions of courts having both common law and equity powers. See also act, article, bill, charter, code, constitution, edict, law, ordinance, provision, statute.

5. In theol., one of the eternal purposes of God, whereby for his own glory he has foreordained whatsoever comes to pass. Whether these decrees are absolute or conditional—that is, whether they are according to the counsel of his own will, "without any foresight of faith or good works, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him thereto" (West. Conf. of Faith, iii.), or are based upon his foreknowledge of the character and course of his free creatures—is a contested question, the Calvinists taking the former view, the Arminians the latter.

By the decree of God for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life and others foreordained to everlasting death.
West. Conf. of Faith, iii. § 2.

6. The judgment or award of an umpire in a case submitted to him.—Absolute decree, a decision that something shall be done with no condition attached to it.—Berlin decree, Milan decree, two decrees of Napoleon I. against Great Britain, enforcing his continental system. The first, issued at Berlin November 21st, 1806, closed against British commerce all continental ports under the control of France (including those of Italy, Spain, Holland and Germany), confiscated all British merchandise wherever found, forbade correspondence with Great Britain, and ordered that all British subjects found within the jurisdiction of France or its allies should be made prisoners of war. The second decree, issued at Milan December 17th, 1807, declared all neutral vessels connected in any way with British commerce or intercourse to be thereby denaturalized, and ordered that they should be treated as English.—Declaratory decree. See declaratory.—Decree arbitral, in Scots law, an award by one or more arbiters.—Decree condemnatory. See decree of abolition, under abolition.—Decree dative, in Scots law, a decree of a commissary conferring on an executor (not being an executor nominate) the office of executor.—Decree in absence, in Scots law, a decree pronounced against a defender who has not appeared or pleaded on the merits of the cause: the same as judgment by default in English common law.—Decree nisi (decree unless), in Eng. law, a decree conditioned on some future event, usually the default of the adverse party to show cause or to perform a condition.—Decree of abolition. See abolition.—Decree of constitution. See constitution.—Decree of locality, in Scots law, a decree of the court allocating the moiety stipend on the different heritors as the proportions in which they are to pay it.—Decree of modification, in Scots law, a decree of the court modifying a stipend to the clerkship, but not allocating it upon the different heritors.—Decree of registration, in Scots law, a decree obtained, without an action, for payment of money secured by a bond or deed containing a clause of consent to registration for execution.—Decree of valuation of lands, in Scots law, a decree of the feudal court determining the extent and value of a heritor's lands.—Byz. 1 and 2. Edict, Statute, etc. See law.—4 and 6. Judgment, Order, etc. (see decision); proclamation, fiat, mandate.

decree (dē-kre'), v. [Of. F. décréter = Sp. Pg. decretar = It. decretare = D. dekretieren = G. dekretieren = Dan. dekretere = Sw. dekretera, < ML. decretare, decree; from the noun: see decree, n.] I. trans. 1. To order or promulgate with authority; issue as an edict or ordinance.

Thou shalt also decree a thing, and it shall be established. Job xlii. 23.

He [William I.] decreed there should be Sheriffs in every Shire, and Justices of Peace for Punishment of Malefactors. Baker, Chronicles, p. 27.

Wherefore fatalists that hold the necessity of all human actions and events may be reduced to these three heads: First, such as, asserting the Deity, suppose it irrefragably to decree and determine all things, and thereby make all actions necessary to us.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, i. 1.

In the autumn of 1535 Cromwell and his agents effected a visitation of the monasteries, the report of which insured their condemnation; and, in the last session of the Long Parliament in 1536, the dissolution of the smaller houses was decreed. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 258.

2. To determine judicially; resolve by sentence; adjudge: as, the court decreed a restoration of the property.

There's the laurel-wreath decreed,
Who both write well, and write full speed.
Cowper, To Robert Lloyd.

3. To determine or resolve legislatively; determine or decide on.

They themselves decreed
Their own revolt, not I. Milton, P. L., iii. 114.
—Byz. To order, ordain, command, enact.

II. intrans. To determine; predetermine immutably; constitute or appoint by edict.

All hast thou spoken as my thoughts are, all
As my eternal purpose hath decreed.
Milton, P. L., iii. 172.

decreasable (dē-kre'-g-ib), a. [< decree + -able.] Capable of being decreed.

decrement (dē-kre'-ment), n. [< decree + -ment.] The act of decreeing; decree.

This unjust decrement. Pope, Martyrs.

decreas (dē-kre'-er), n. [< decree + -er.] One who decrees.

In thy book it is written of me, says Christ, that I should do thy will; he is not willing only, but the first decreer of it, it is written of me. Goodwin, Works, i. iii. 108.

decreet (dē-kret'), n. [< OF. decret, < L. decretum, a decree; see decree.] In Scots law, a decree. See decree, n., 1.

Freudraught . . . obtained a decret against him for 300,000 merks. Spalding, Hist. Troubles in Scotland, i. 51.

decrement (dek-rē-ment), n. [= Sp. Pg. It. decremento, < LL. decrementum, a decrease, < L. decrescere, decrease: see decrease.] 1. The act or state of decreasing; the becoming gradually less; lessening; waste.

I do not believe the understanding part of man received any natural decrement or diminution.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), i. 723.

Rocks, mountains, and the other elevations of the earth suffer a continual decrement. Woodward.

2. The quantity lost by gradual diminution or waste; specifically, in math., the small part by which a variable quantity becomes less and less.

The increments in time are proportional to the decrements in pressure. Frankland, Chemistry, iii. 1. 580.

Each increment of evolution entails a decrement of reproduction that is not accurately proportionate, but somewhat less than proportionate.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 304.

3. In her., the condition of waning; said of the moon. It is represented by turning the horns of the crescent toward the sinister side. Also called detriment.—4. In crystal., a successive diminution of the layers of molecules applied to the faces of the primitive form, by which the secondary forms are hypothetically produced.—Equal decrement of life, in the doctrine of annuities of insurance companies, the theory that in a given number of lives there should be an equal annual decrease within a given period.

decrepit (dē-krep'-it), a. [< OF. decrepit, F. décrépité = Sp. decretito = Pg. It. decrepito, < L. decrepitus, an adj. applied to old men and old animals, and usually translated 'very old': lit. meaning uncertain; usually explained as 'noiseless' (because 'old people creep about quietly' or 'like shadows'), otherwise as 'broken'; < de-priv. + crepitus, pp. of crepare, make a noise, rattle, break with a crash: see crepitat.] Broken down in health, physical or mental, especially from age; wasted or worn by infirmities; weakened, especially by age.

An old decrepit wretch
That has no sense, no shew.

R. Jonson, Volpone, iii. 4.
He was already decrepit with premature old age.
Melley, Dutch Republic, i. 102.

[Sometimes incorrectly spelled decrepid.]

Last, winter comes, decrepid, old, and dull.
Jennys, An Ode.

decrepitate (dē-krep'-i-tāt), v.; pret. and pp. decrepitated, ppr. decrepitating. [*< NL. as if *decrepitatus*, pp. of **decrepitare* > F. décrépiter = Sp. Pg. decrepitar = It. decrepitare, < L. de- + crepitatus, pp. of crepitare, crackle, break with a noise: see crepitat.] I. intrans. To crackle, as salt when roasting.

II. trans. To roast or calcine in a strong heat, so as to cause a continual bursting or crackling of the substance: as, to decrepitate salt.

So will it come to pass in a pot of salt, although decrepitated.

St. F. Browne, Vulg. Err.

decrepitation (dē-krep'-i-tā'-shn), n. [= F. decrepitation = Sp. decrepitation = Pg. decrepitação = It. decrepitatione, < *NL. as if *decrepitatio(n)-*, < **decrepitare*: see decrepitate.] The act of snapping or bursting with a crackling noise on being heated, or the crackling noise, accompanying the flying asunder of their parts, made by various salts and minerals when heated. It is caused by the unequal sudden expansion of their substance by the heat, or by the expansion and volatilization of water or other liquid held mechanically within them.

decrepity (dē-krep'-it-ē), adv. In a decrepit manner; as one broken down by infirmities.

And she rose up decrepity
For a last dim look at earth and sea.
Lewis, Vision of Sir Launfal, ii. 1.

decrepitude (dē-krep'-it-ē), n. Decrepitudo. decrepitude (dē-krep'-i-tūd), n. [< F. décrétitude = Sp. decrepitud = Pg. decrepitude, < *L. as if *decrepitudo*, < decrepitus, decrepit: see decrepit.] The state of being broken down by infirmities, physical or mental, especially infirmities of age.

Many seem to pass on from youth to decrepitude without any reflection on the end of life.

Johnson, Rambler, No. 78.

decrepity (dē-krep'-i-tē), n. [< ML. decrepiti-tas, < L. decrepitus, decrepit: see decrepit.] Decrepitudo.

Is a true loadstone to draw on Decrepity.
Chapman, All Fools, iv. 1.

decrecendo (It. pron. dē-kre-ahen-'dō), n. [It., ppr. of decreascere, < L. decreascere, decrease: see decrease.] In music, a gradual diminution of force; a passing from loud to soft: opposed to crescendo, and the same as diminuendo: often indicated by decres., dec., or the sign >.

decreascent (dē-kres-'ent), a. and n. [= F. décroissant, etc., < L. decreascen-tis, ppr. of decreascere, decrease: see decrease, and cf. crescent.] I. a. Decreasing; becoming gradually less; waning, as the moon.

Saddeuing in her childless castle, sent,
Between the in-crescent and de-crescent moon,
Arms for her son, and loosed him from his vow.
Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

Specifically.—(e) In her., decreasing or waning: said of the moon when represented with the points toward the sinister side. Also decurs. (b) In bot., diminishing gradually from below upward.

II. n. In her., the moon in her decrement: used as a bearing. See decrement, 3. decreascent-pinnate (dē-kres-'ent-pin-'āt), a. In bot., pinnate with leaflets gradually decreasing in size from the base.

decret, n. See decret, decrees.
decretal (dē-kre-'tāl), a. and n. [< ML. decretalis, < L. decretum, a decree: see decree.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of a decree; containing a decree or decrees.

When any sentence of a father is cited, and inserted into a decretal epistle of a pope, or any part of the canon law, that sentence is thereby made authentic.

Donne, Sermons, xxii.

2. Done according to a decree; decreed; fatal. [Rare.]

So here's a most decretal end of me.

Chapman, Byron's Tragedy, v. 1.

II. n. [= F. décrétale = Sp. Pg. decretal = It. decretale, < ML. decretale, a decree, neut. of adj. decretalis: see above.] 1. An authoritative order or decree; specifically, a letter of the pope determining some point or question in ecclesiastical law.

What principle . . . had they then to judges of heretics, besides the single dictates or decretals of private bishops?

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), ii. 515.

This is not a process of reasoning, but an act of will—a decretal enveloped in a scientific nimbus.

J. Northcote, Materialism, p. 107.

2. A book of decrees or edicts; a body of laws; specifically [esp.], in the plural, the second part of the canon law: so called because it contains the decrees of sundry popes determining points of ecclesiastical law.

As in canon so in the decretals I can poultre rede a lynce.
Piers Plowman (B), v. 432.

In the year 1260 Gregory IX. had approved of the five books of Decretals compiled by Raymond of Penafort from the Extravagants of the recent popes.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 307.

False Decretals, a collection of canon law, of the ninth century, purporting to have been made by one Isidore Mercator, and unquestioned till the fifteenth century, but since proved to consist largely of spurious or forged material decretals. Also called Pseudo-Isidore Decretals, to distinguish them from the collection drawn from the seventh century, attributed to Isidore of Seville, and consisting of genuine documents.

decretal (dē-kre-'tāl), n. [< LL. decretio(n)-, decrease, < L. decretus, pp. of decreasco: see decrease.] A decreasing.

Nor can we now perceive that the world becomes more or less than it was, by which decretion we might guess at a former increase.

Sp. Pearson, Expos. of Creed, i.

decretist (dē-kre-'tist), n. [= OF. decretiste (also decretiste; see decretist), F. décretiste = Sp. Pg. decretista (cf. It. decretalista), < ML. decretista, < L. decretum, decree: see decree, decretal. Cf. decretist.] In medieval universities, a student in the faculty of law; specifically, a student of the decretals.

decretistery, n. [ME. decretistrie, < OF. decretistrie, discretistrie, var. of decretiste: see decretist.] A decretist.

At this doctor and dilettant and decretist of canon.
Piers Plowman (C), xvi. 25.

decretive (dē-kre-'tiv), a. [< L. decret-ivm, decree, + -iv.] Having the force of a decree; pertaining to a decree.

decretorial (dek-rē-'tō-ri-āl), a. [< decretory + -al.] Decretory; authoritative; critical.

Besides the usual or calendary month, there are but four considerable, that is, the month of peragrator, of apparition, of consecration, and the medicinal or decretorial month.

St. F. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 2.

decretorily (dek-rē-'tō-ri-ly), adv. In a definitive manner; as decreed.

decretory (dek-rē-'tō-ri), a. [= F. décretoire = Sp. Pg. It. decretorio, < L. decretorius, < decretum, a decree: see decree.] 1. Pertaining to or following a decree; established by a decree; judicial; definitive.

They that . . . are too decretory and enunciative of speedy judgments to their enemies, turn their religion into revenge.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), i. 518.

Sir, you are not sure that when the decretory hour of death overtakes you, you shall have one minute of an hour allowed you to commit your spirits into the hand of the Lord Jesus Christ.

C. Maier, Mag. Christ., iv. 7.

2. Critical; determining; in which there is some definitive event.

The main considerations, which most set off this number, are observations drawn from the motions of the moon, supposed to be measured by seven, and the critical or decretory dates dependent on that number.

St. F. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 12.

decrewt (dē-kre-'t), v. t. [*For *decreo* (as accreo for accreo), < OF. decrea, F. décré, pp. of decreasire, decreasire, F. décrétire, decrease: see decrease.] To decrease.

St. F. Browne, Characters.

decrustation (dē-kres-tā'-shn), n. [< de-priv. + crustation.] The act of removing a crust.

deery (dē-kri'), v. t.; pret. and pp. decried, ppr. decraying. [< F. décrier, OF. decrier, cry down, discredit, disparage, < dis- (L. dis-) + crio, cry: see cry.] 1. To cry down; speak disparagingly of; censure as faulty or worthless; clamor against: as, to decur a poem.

For small errors they whole plays decur. Dryden.

Far be it from me to decur moral virtue, which even heathens have granted to be a reward to itself.

Sp. Attorneys, Sermons, I, Pref. to xi.

Dear, charming nymph, neglected and despoiled,
My shame in crowds, my solitary pride.

Goldsmith, Des. VII., l. 411.

24. To deprive of credit officially.

The king may at any time decur, or cry down, any coin of the kingdom, and make it no longer current.

Blackstone, Com., I, 278.

=Syn. 1. Decur, Depreciate, Detract from, Derogate from, Disparage, run down, discredit. These words agree in expressing an effort to lower the esteem in which a person or thing is held. If the effort is unjust, the injustice is not so conspicuous as in the words compared under expose. Decur, to cry down, clamor against, implies activity and publicity; it is hardly applicable to persons. Depreciate, primarily to lower the value of, is less forcible than decur, and may apply to persons. Detract from and derogate from have almost precisely the same meaning—to take from or diminish reputation, as by caviling, ascribing success to accident, good conduct to low motives, etc. Disparage, to make a thing unequal to what it was in reputation; under-rate. The last four need not have a personal subject: as it would derogate very much from his standing; it would disparage him in public estimation if he were known.

The Administration and its friends have been attempting to circumscribe, and to decur, the powers belonging to other branches.

D. Webster, Speech, Oct. 1st, 1832.

Our vulgar luxury depreciates objects not fitted to adorn our dwellings.

Mary Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 193.

If a man is honest, it detracts nothing from his merits to say he had the wit to see that honesty is the best policy.

F. Dicey, Victor Emmanuel, p. 112.

By intermingling a subject's speech with the king's message, he [the secretary] seemed to derogate from the honor and majesty of a king.

I. D. Israeli, Curios of Lit., IV, 208.

Why should we make it a point with our false modesty to disparage that man we are, and that form of being as assigned to us?

Emerson, Spiritual Laws.

decrystallization (dē-kris'ta-li-zā'shon), n. [de- priv. + crystal + -ation.] The act or process of losing the crystalline structure. [Rare.]

dedicates (dēd'ī-kā-tēs), n. [< dedicate + -es.] One to whom a thing is dedicated. [Rare.]

As every dedication meant a present proportioned to the circumstances of the dedicatee, there was a natural temptation to be lavish of them. Encyc. Brit., VIII. 514.

dedication (dēd'ī-kā'shon), n. [< OF. dedicatum, dedicarium (also dedicence, F. dédicace) = Sp. dedicacion = Pg. dedicacão = It. dedicazione = D. dedicatie = Dan. Sw. dedikation, < L. dedicatio (n-), dedication, < dedicare, dedicate: see dedicate.] 1. The act of consecrating to a deity or to a sacred use with appropriate solemnities; a solemn appropriation or setting apart: as, the dedication of a church.

And the children of Israel . . . kept the dedication of this house of God with joy. Mara vi. 16.

2. The act of devoting with solemnity or earnestness of feeling to any purpose.—3. The act of inscribing or addressing a literary or an artistic work to a patron, friend, or public character.

Neither is the modern dedication of books and writings, as to patrons, to be commended.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I. 26.

4. An address prefixed to a literary or musical composition, inscribed to a patron, as a means of recommending the work to his protection and favor, or, as now usually, to a private friend or to a public character, as a mark of affection or respect.

Freud as Apollo on his torched hill,
Sets full-blown Bufo, puff'd by silly quill;
Fed by soft dedication all day long,
Horace and he went hand in hand in song.
Pope, Prolog. to Satires, I. 222.

5. In law, a voluntary surrender or abandonment of property by the owner to public use, as of land, by consenting to the making of a highway upon it, or of an invention, by neglect to patent it.—Fest of the Dedication, a feast instituted at the liberation of Jerusalem from the Syrians by Judas Maccabeus, about 165 B. C., in commemoration of the purification of the Temple and dedication of a new altar, after the pollution of the Temple and former altar by Antiochus Epiphanes. See 1 Mac. iv. 48-50; 2 Mac. i. 18, x. 2-8. Also called the Epiphania. = syn. 1 and 2. Consecration, devotion.—3 and 4. Inscription.

dedicator (dēd'ī-kā-tor), n. [= It. dedicatore, < LL. dedicator, < L. dedicare, dedicate: see dedicate.] One who dedicates; specifically, one who inscribes a book to a patron, friend, or public character.

Leave dangerous truths to unsuccessful satires,
And flattery to falacious dedicators.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, I. 152.

dedicatorial (dēd'ī-kā-tō'ri-āl), a. [< dedicatory + -al.] Same as dedicatory.

dedicatory (dēd'ī-kā-tō'ri-āl), a. and n. [= F. dédicatoire; as dedicate + -ory.] I. a. Of the nature of a dedication; serving as a dedication.

An epistle dedicatory. Dryden, Love's Triumph, Ep. Ded.

II. n. A dedication.

Necro a kin to him who set forth a passion sermon, with a formal dedicatory in great letters to our Raviour.

Milton, Apology for Smectymnua.

dedicator (dēd'ī-kā-tor), n. [< dedicate + -or.] The act of dedicating; dedication.
dedimus (dēd'ī-mus), n. [< L. dedimus, we have given, 1st pers. pl. perf. ind. act. of dare, give: see dare.] In law, a writ to commission one who is not a judge to do some act in place of a judge, as to examine a witness, etc. The Latin form of the writ began "Dedimus potestatem," we have given power.

dedit (dē-dē'), n. [F.] In French and French-Canadian law, the sum stipulated as a penalty for breach of contract.

dedition (dēd'ī-sh'on), n. [< L. deditio (n-), < dedere, give up, surrender, devote, < de, away, + dare, give: see dare.] The act of yielding anything; surrender.

It was not a complete conquest, but rather a dedition upon terms and capitulations agreed between the conqueror and the conquered.

Sir M. Hale, Hist. Com. Law of Eng.

deditionancy (dēd'ī-tish'ig-nā-si), n. [< L. deditionis, deditionis, belonging to a surrender, as n., a captive (< dedere, pp. dedatus, give up, surrender: see dedition), + -ancy.] In early Roman law, the condition or status of the lowest class of freedmen, who were not admitted to full citizenship because of misconduct during their condition of slavery.

dedity, a. and adv. An obsolete spelling of deadly.

dedo (dē'dō), n. [Sp. Pg., a finger, finger-breadth, < L. digitus, a finger: see digit.] A Spanish and Portuguese long measure; a finger-breadth. The Spanish measure is about  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an English inch; the Portuguese measure equals  $\frac{1}{16}$  of an English inch.

dedolation (dēd'ō-lā'shon), n. [= F. dédolation, < NL. dedolatio (n-), < L. dedolare, hew away, < de, away, + dolare, hew, chip with an ax.]. The action by which a cutting instrument divides obliquely any part of the body and produces a wound accompanied by loss of substance. Wounds by dedolation most frequently occur on the head. Dunglison.

dedolent (dēd'ō-lent), a. [< L. dedolent (t-), pp. of dolere, cease to grieve, < de-priv. + dolere, grieve: see dole.] Feeling no sorrow or compunction.

When once the criterion or perceptive faculty has lost its tenderness and sensibility, and the mind becomes reprobate, then darkness and light, good and evil, . . . are all one. Then . . . men are dedolent and past feeling.
Hallucini, Saving of Souls, p. 114.

No men [are] so accursed with indelible infamy and dedolent impetuosity as Authors of Heresies.

de domo reparando (dē dō'mō rep-a-ran'dō), [L., for the repairing of a building: de, of; domo, abl. of domus, a house, building; reparando, abl. ger. of reparare, repair: see repair.] A writ issued at common law at the suit of an owner against his neighbor whose house he fears will fall, to the damage of his own, or against his co-tenant to compel him to share the expense of repairing property held in common.

deduction (dēd-ŭk'shŭn), n. A misleading; a turning in the wrong direction.

Let any one think of the amount of deduction attempted about the repeal of the Corn Laws.

Hymns to Virginia, etc. (R. E. T. S.), Pref., p. viii.

deduce (dēd-ŭs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deduced, ppr. deducing. [= F. déduire = Sp. deducir = Pg. deduzir = It. dedurre, < L. deducere, lead away, bring down, draw away, derive, < de, down, away, + ducere, lead; see duct, duke. Cf. adduce, conduce, etc., and see deduct.] 1. To lead forth or away; conduct.

He should hither deduce a colony.

Selden, Illustrations of Drayton, xvii.

2. To trace the course of; describe from first to last.

I will deduce him from his cradle, till he was swallowed up in the gulf of fatality. Sir H. Watson.

The greatest News we now have here is a notable naval fight that was lately betwixt the Spaniard and Hollander, in the Downs; but to make it more intelligible, I will deduce the Business from the Beginning.

Howell, Letters, i. vi. 40.

3. To draw; derive; trace.

My boast is not that I deduce my birth

From Iolus enthron'd.

Cowper, My Mother's Picture.

O goddess, say, shall I deduce my rhymes From the dire nation in its early times? Pope.

The Toryism of Scott sprang from love of the past; that of Carlyle is far more dangerously infectious, for it is logically deduced from a deep disdain of human nature.

Lovell, Study Windows, p. 141.

4. To derive or conclude as a result of a known principle; draw as a necessary conclusion; infer from what is known or believed. See deduction, and deductive reasoning, under deductive.

Reason is nothing but the faculty of deducing unknown truths from principles already known. Locke.

No just Herule Poun over was or can be made, from whence one great Moral may not be deduced.

Addison, Spectator, No. 309.

Certain propensities of human nature are assumed; and from these premises the whole science of politics is synthetically deduced.

Macaulay, Mill on Government.

5. To bring before a court of justice for decision. Bacon.—6. To deduct.

A matter of four hundred

To be deduced upon the payment. B. Jonson.

deducement (dēd-ŭk'mēnt), n. [< deduce + -ment.] A deduced proposition; the conclusion of a logical deduction.

What other deducements or analogies are cited out of St. Paul, to prove a likeness between the ministers of the Old and New Testament? Milton, Church-Government.

deducibility (dēd-ŭ-si-bil'i-ti), n. [< deducible: see duc.] The quality of being deducible; deducibleness. Coleridge.

deducible (dēd-ŭ-si-bl), a. [< deduce + -ible.] 1. Capable of being brought down.

As if . . . (tod [were]) deducible to human imbecility. State Trials, Lt.-Col. Lilburne, an, 1642.

2. Capable of being derived by reasoning from known principles or facts; inferable by deduction.

All properties of a triangle . . . are deducible from the complex idea of three lines including a space. Locke.

I will add no more to the length of this sermon than by two or three short and independent rules deducible from it. Bernie, Tristram Shandy, li. 17.

deducibleness (dēd-ŭ-si-bl-nes), n. The quality of being deducible.

deductive (dēd-ŭk'tiv), a. [< deduce + -ive.] Performing an act of deduction. [Rare.]

deduct (dēd-ŭkt'), v. t. [< L. deducere, pp. of deducere, lead away, draw away, subtract, etc.: see deduce.] 1. To lead forth or away; deduce; conduct.

The Philippans, . . . a people deducted out of the cities of Philippus.

J. Udal, Pref. to Philippans.

2. To trace out; set forth.

For diverse great and important considerations, which were here too long to be deducted.

Mary, Queen of Scots, Letter to Babington (1585), [in Howell's State Trials.]

3. To bring down; reduce.

Clark. Why, sir? alas, 'tis nothing: 'tis but so many months, so many weeks, so many—

Onesie. Do not deduct it to days, 'twill be the more tedious; and to measure it by hours seems to be intolerable. Middleton, Measuring, and Rowley, Old Law, iii. 1.

4. To take away, separate, or remove in numbering, estimating, or calculating; subtract, as a counterbalancing item or particular; as, to deduct losses from the total receipts; from the amount of profits deduct the freight-charges.

The late king had also agreed that two and a half per cent should be deducted out of the pay of the foreign troops.

Sp. Burnet, Hist. Own Times, an, 1711.

=Syn. & Deduct, Subtract. These words cannot properly be used interchangeably. Deduct is to lead away, set aside, in a general or distributive sense; subtract, to draw off, remove, in a literal or operative sense. In settling a mercantile account, certain items as charges, losses, etc., are deducted by being added together and their total subtracted from the grand total of the transaction. From a parcel of goods of known value or number articles are subtracted or literally taken away as required; the value or number of the remainder at any time may be ascertained by deducting the value or number of those taken from the original package; and this again is effected by subtracting the figures representing the smaller amount from those representing the larger.

deductible (dēd-ŭk'ti-bl), a. [< deduct + -ible.]

1. Capable of being deducted or withdrawn.—

2. Deductible.

deductio (dēd-ŭk'ti-ŭ), n. [L.: see deduction.] Deduction; specifically, in music, the regular succession of notes in the hexachord and the musical system introduced by Guido d'Arezzo, about A. D. 1024. Hence, deductio prima, the notes of the first hexachord; deductio secunda, the notes of the second hexachord; and so on to deductio septima.—Deductio ad impossibile (Latin translation of Greek εἰς τὸ ἀδύνατον), deductio to the impossible, in logic, the proof of the falsity of a hypothesis by showing that it leads to a conclusion known to be false.

deduction (dēd-ŭk'shŭn), n. [< ME. deducoun, < OF. deduction, F. déduction = Sp. deduccion = Pg. deduccion = It. deduzione, < L. deductio (n.), deduction, < deducere, lead or take away, deduce, deduct; see deduce and deduct.] 1. A drawing or tracing out and setting forth.

A complete deduction of the progress of navigation and commerce, from its first principle, to its present age.

Erskyn, To my Lord Treasurer.

2. The act of deriving; derivation.

To them [vowels], as is well known to etymologists, little regard is to be shown in the deduction of one language from another.

Johnson, Eng. Dict., Pref.

3. In logic, derivation as a result from a known principle; necessary inference; also, the result itself, as so concluded. As a term of logic, it is a translation of Aristotle's ἀναγωγή (translated deductio by Boethius), and properly signifies an illicite descent from a general principle to the result of that principle in a special case; it is specially used by Aristotle when there is a doubt whether the case truly comes under the principle. By the older logicians it is little used, and not with any exact signification. In modern times it has been chiefly employed by those who hold that all reasoning is either a descent from generals to particulars (deduction) or an ascent from particulars to generals (induction). See deductive reasoning, under deductive.

Probation may be either a process of deduction—that is, the leading of proof out of one higher or more general proposition—or a process of induction—that is, the leading of proof out of a plurality of lower or less general judgments.

Sir W. Hamilton.

Deduction . . . is the inverse process of inferring a particular case from a law or cases assumed to be of like nature. G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, 1st ser., III. iv § 47.

It is astonishing how little of the real life of the time we learn from the Troubadours except by way of inference and deduction.

Lovell, Study Windows, p. 236.

4. The act of deducting or taking away; subtraction; abatement; as, the deduction of the subtrahend from the minuend; prompt payment will insure a large deduction.—5. A payment; a statement of payments.

The other Curate, of Luddington, payde by the Warden, as aperryth the abuse in the deductions of the same College.

English Glss (R. E. T. S.), p. 232.

Deduction for new, in mercantile law, the allowance, usually one third, made to one who is required to reimburse or to advance the cost of repairing a damage to a vessel caused by the perils of navigation, the presumption being that the renewed part is better than the old.—Deduction of a claim, in law, the proof of a right by showing that it results from principles of law or equity.—Deduction of a concept, in Kantian philos., the proof that the concept has a meaning—that is, refers to an object.—Transcendental deduction, in Kantian metaph., the proof of the objective validity of any concept.—Syn. & Conclusion, Convolutions, etc. See inference.—& Subtraction, diminution, discount, etc.

deductive (dēd-ŭk'tiv), a. [= F. déductif = Sp. deductivo, < L. deductivus, < L. deducere, deduce, deduct; see deduce and deduct.] 1. Consisting of deduction; of the nature of or based on inference from accepted principles.

We ought therefore to be fully aware of the modes and degree in which the forms of deductive reasoning are affected by the theory of probability, and many persons might be surprised at the results which must be admitted.

Jeans.

Before deductives interpretation of the general truths, there must be some inductive establishment of them.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 211.

2. Deduced; derived as a conclusion from accepted principles; relating to inference from a principle to the results of that principle in any special case.

He labours to introduce a secondary and deductive Atheism: that although men concede there is a God, yet they should deny his providence.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 10.

Deductive method, in the logical system of J. S. Mill, that mode of investigation by which the law of an effect is ascertained from the consideration of the laws of the different tendencies of which it is the joint result. This method consists of three kinds of operation, the first direct induction, the second ratiocination, the third verification.

To the deductive method, thus characterized in its three constituent parts of induction, ratiocination, and verification, the human mind is indebted for its most conspicuous triumphs in the investigation of nature.

Mull, Logic, III. xi § 4.

Deductive reasoning is commonly opposed to inductive, and is meant to include all necessary reasoning (even mathematical induction), together with those probable reasonings which predict results as true in the long run, but excluding those inferences which are regarded as being open to correction in the long run. Thus, if, from counting the letters on a single page, one concludes the proportions of the different letters which will generally be found in a font of type, the reasoning is inductive; but if, knowing what the proportions generally are, one concludes what will be needed in printing a particular book or page, the reasoning is deductive.

deductively (dēd-ŭk'tiv-lī), adv. By deduction; in consequence of a general principle.

There is scarce a popular error rampant in our days, which is not either directly expressed or deductively contained in this work [Pliny's Natural History].

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 2.

deduct, v. [ME., also dedute and shortened dute, < OF. deduit, deduit = Pr. deduch, < ML. deductus, diversion, pleasure, (in L.) a drawing away, < L. deducere, draw away; see deduct, deduction. For the meaning, cf. disson.] Pleasure; sport; pastime.

Upon his hand he bar for his dedut

Au eagle tane, as eny lylie whyt.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale (ed. Morris), l. 1219.

Than drue thei forth the day in dedut & in murthe.

William of Palerne (R. E. T. S.), l. 4502.

deduplication (dēd-ŭ-pil-kā'shŭn), n. [= F. déduplication, < NL. deduplicatio (n.), < **duplicare* (F. dédoubler), divide into two, < L. de + duphcare, duplicate, double; see duph-car.] In bot., same as chorissus.

dee (dē), v. i. [Sc., = E. die.] To die.

And for bonnie Annie Lawrie

I d lay me down and dee. Scotch song.

dee (dē), n. [Sc., = dey.] A dairymaid. See dey.

deed (dēd), n. [Early mod. E. also deode; < ME. deed, dede, < AS. dād = OS. dād = OFries. dadi = D. daad = OHG. MHG. tāt, G. tat, that = Icel. dāð = Sw. dād = Dan. daad = Goth. ga-dāds], deed, a thing done, with formative -d (orig. pp. suffix; see -d, -d), < dōn (v 'do'), do; see do.] 1. That which is done, acted, performed, or accomplished; a doing; an act; a word of extensive application, including whatever is done, good or bad, great or small.

And alle the gode dedes a man doth by his lyve is litill a-vaille but yet he haue gode ende

Martin (R. E. T. S.), l. 92.

Ther dide Arthur merveillouse dedes of armes, that gretly he be-helden, bothe on that oon part and on the tother.

Martin (E. T. S.), l. 117.

The altering of religion, the making of ecclesiastical laws, with other the like actions belonging unto the power of dominion, are still termed the deeds of the king.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, viii. 1.

And Joseph said unto them, What deed is this that ye have done?

Gen. xlv. 15.

Words are women, deeds are men.

G. Herbert, Jacula Prudentum.

Arthur yet had done no deed of arms.

Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

The motives of the Iniquitors were, we may presume, good, but their deeds were diabolical.

Pep. Soc. No., XXII. 148.

2. Power of action; agency; performance.

Both will and deed created free. Milton, P. L., v. 549.

3. In law, a writing on parchment or paper, authenticated by the seal of the person whose mind it purports to declare; more specifically, such a writing made for the purpose of conveying real estate. See indenture, and deed poll, below.

Inquire the Jew's house out, give him this deed,

And let him sign it. Shak., M. of V., iv. 2.

Receive this scroll.

A deed of gift, of body, and of soul.

Martine, Doctor Faustus, li. 1.

Deed for a deed. See bond.—Commissioners of deeds. See commissioner.—Composition deed. See composition.—Deed of accession, deed of assumption. See accession, assumption.—Deed of bargain and sale. See bargain and sale, under bargain.—Deed of saying, the executing what has been said or promised; performance of what has been undertaken.

In the plainer and simpler kind of people,
The deed of saying is quite out of use.
Shak., T. of A., v. 1.

Deed of trust, a conveyance to one party of property, to be by him held in trust for others. Specifically, a conveyance by or on behalf of a debtor, to a third person, of real or personal property, or both, in trust to secure payment of creditors or to indemnify parties. — Deed poll (deed + poll for poll, pp. of poll, slave, shew), a deed made by one party only: so called because the paper or parchment is out even and not indented. See indenture. — Estoppel by deed. See estoppel. — Gratuitous deed. See gratuitous conveyance, under conveyance. — In deed, in fact; in reality: used chiefly in the phrase in very deed, in deed and in truth. See under

One . . . wrote certain prett verses of the Emperor Maximilian, to warn him that he should not glory too much in his own strength, for he did in very deed.
Puttenham, Art. of Eng. Poets, p. 203.

Let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth.
John iii. 18.

Narrative of a deed. See narrative. — To acknowledge a deed, to damn a deed, to extend a deed. See the verb. — Syn. 1. Action, Act, Deed, (See action.) Exploit, etc. See feat.

deed (dēd), v. t. [deed, n.] To convey or transfer by deed: as, he deeded all his estate to his eldest son.

deed-box (dēd'box), n. A box for keeping deeds and other valuable papers, and often adapted to the common size of folded papers, usual in lawyers' offices, etc.

deed-doer (dēd'dō'er), n. A doer; a perpetrator.

The deed-doers Matrevera and Gourney . . . durst not abide the trial.
Daniel, Hist. Eng., p. 185.

deedful (dēd'fūl), a. [deed + -ful.] Characterised or marked by deeds or exploits; full of deeds; stirring.

You have made the wisest choice,
A life that moves to gracious ends
Thro' troops of unrecording friends,
A deedful life.
Tennyson, To —.

deedily (dēd'i-lī), adv. [deedily + -ly.] In a deedly manner; actively; busily. [Rare.]

Frank Churchill at a table near her, most deedily occupied about her spectacles.
Jane Austen, Emma, II. 2.

deedless (dēd'les), a. [(= G. thatenlos = leel. dādhlous = Dan. daadlos) < deed + -less.] Inactive; unmarked by deeds or exploits.

Speaking in deeds, and deedless in his tongue.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 2.

deeds (dēdz), n. pl. [*E. dial. and Sc., = deads.*] Earth, gravel, etc., thrown out in digging; specifically, in coal-mining, refuse rock; attle thrown upon the dump, burrow, or spoil-bank. Also dead. See dead, n., 2. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

What is taken out of the ditch (vernacularly the deeds) thrown behind this facing to support it
Agric. Narr. Pers., p. 131 (Jamicum.)

deedy (dē'dī), a. [(= G. thätig, active) < deed + -y.] Industrious; active. [Rare.]

Who praiseth a horse that feeds well but is not deedy for the race or travel, speed or length?

In a messenger sent is required celerity, sincerity, constancy; that he be speedy, that he be heedful, and as we say, that he be deedy.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 111.

There were grim silent depths in Nic's character; a small deedy spark in his eye, as it caught Christine's, was all that showed his consciousness of her.
T. Hardy, The Wailing Supper, III.

deedy (dē'dī), *n.; pl. deedies (-dis). A chicken or young fowl. [South. U. S.]*

They disputed about the best methods of tending the newly hatched deedies, that had chipped the shell so late in the fall as to be embarrassed by the frosts and the coming cold weather.
E. Craddock, Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 67.

deem (dēm), v. [*ME. doemen, < AS. dōman (= ONorth. dōma = OS. dōmian = OFries. dōma = D. doemen = MLG. dōmen = OHG. tōmen, MHG. tūmen = Icel. dōma = Sw. dōmma = Dan. dōmme = Goth. gadōmjan), judge, deem, < dōm, judgment, doom: see doom, n., and cf. doom, v.] 1. trans. 1. To think, judge, or hold as an opinion; decide or believe on consideration; suppose: as, he deemed it prudent to be silent.*

And in the field he left him liggeng,
Denying non other butt that he was dede.

The crews of English and American vessels engaged in what used to be termed deep-sea voyages are made up of much the same material. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 436.

Deep-sea lead-line, a line used for soundings from 20 to 300 fathoms, marked at every 5 fathoms and used with a lead ranging from 60 to 150 pounds in weight.—Deep-sea sounding-machine, the combination of mechanical contrivances by the aid of which soundings may be made to great depths, with a close approach to accuracy. This result has been attained by a combination of improvements, in which great ingenuity has been displayed, and in which the inventive genius of Sir William Thomson has been particularly conspicuous. The principal features of the most perfect sounding-machine are: (1) the sinker, which is a cannon-ball, through which passes a cylinder provided with a valve to collect and retain a specimen of the bottom, the cylinder being, by an ingenious mechanical arrangement, detached from the shot, which remains at the bottom; (2) the line, made of steel wire, weighing about 14 pounds to the nautical mile; (3) machinery for regulating the lowering of the sinker and for reeling in the wire with the cylinder attached in such a manner that the irregular strain due to the motion of the ship may be guarded against and the danger of breakage thus reduced to a minimum. In the deepest accurate sounding yet made the bottom was reached at the depth of 4,056 fathoms, but owing to the breaking of the wire no specimen was obtained. This sounding was made on the "Tuscarora" by Commander G. M. Bellnap, U. S. N., in north latitude 44° 32', east longitude 158° 52'. The deep-sea sounding up was that of the United States Coast Survey steamer "Blake," off Porto Rico, the depth there reached being 4,661 fathoms.

deep-seated (dēp'sē'ted), a. Far removed from the surface; deeply rooted or lodged; firmly implanted: as, a deep-seated disease; deep-seated prejudice.

His grief was too deep-seated for outward manifestation.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 337.

deep-set (dēp'set), a. Set deeply; fixed far downward or inward, as the eyes in their sockets.
His deep-set eyes
Bright 'mid his wrinkles, made him seem a right wise.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 334.

deepsome (dēp'sum), a. [deep + -some.] Deep, or somewhat deep.
This said, he [Proteus] diu'd the deepsome wat'rie heapes.
Chapman, Idymey, iv.

deep-waisted (dēp'wās'ted), a. Having a deep waist, as a ship when the quarter-deck and forecabin are raised higher than usual above the level of the spar-deck.

deer (dēr), n. sing. and pl. [Early mod. E. also deor, and often deor, deare; ME. der, deer, < AS. deor, a wild animal, often in combination, wild deor, wildeor, wilder (whence ult. E. wilderness, q. v.), *OS. dier = OFries. dier = D. dier = LG. deer, deert = OHG. dor, MHG. tier, G. tier, thier = Icel. dýr = Sw. djur = Dan. dyr = Goth. dius, a wild animal. Origin uncertain; perhaps orig. an adj., meaning 'wild,' identical with AS. deor, bold, brave, vehement, OHG. thorik, wild. (The AS. deor, bold, brave, vehement, was merged later with deore, E. dear: see dear.) Not connected with Gr. pho, pho, a wild beast, or with L. ferus, wild, fam. fera (sc. bestia), a wild beast (whence ult. E. ferous, ferocious). The restricted (but not exclusive) use of the word (for Cervus) appears in ME., Icel., Sw., Dan., and G. (in hunters' language), and now prevails in mod. E. It is due to the importance of this animal in the chase. Similarly, in Iceland, dýr is applied esp. to the fox, as the only beast of prey. In some parts of the United States the horse, as the most important of a general class, is called simply beast or critter (creature); 'a critter company' is a cavalry company (Prov., U. S.) 1. Any wild quadruped.
But mice, and rats, and such small deer,
Have been Tom's food for seven long year.
Shak., Lear, iii. 4.*

2. The general name of the solid-horned ruminants of the family Cervidae, and especially of the genus Cervus. See these words. Most of the deer have solid deciduous horns, of the kind called antlers, in the male only; but in the reindeer they are present in both sexes; in the musk-deer (Moschus) they are wanting. The largest living deer are the elk of Europe and the moose of America; the smallest are the muntjacs and musk-deer, which are further distinguished by the large tusk-like canine teeth of the males. The term deer being so comprehensive, and the animals being so conspicuous, the leading kinds have mostly received distinctive names, as the reindeer, roe-deer, musk-deer, etc. (See these words, and also brocket, elk, moose, roe, stag, wapiti, caribou, black-tail.) Deer are found fossil as far back as the Pliocene period. The best-known extinct species is the Irish elk, Cervus megacervus. The leading genera of living deer are Acer, Rangifer, Dama, Cervus (with many subgenera), Capreolus, Cervulus, Mooschus, and Hydropotes. The species are numerous, and are found in most continental parts of the world, excepting southern Africa and Australia. The common deer of the United States is Cervus virginianus. See Cervidae.

3. A term loosely applied to the chevrotains, of the family Tragulidae (which see), from their resemblance to musk-deer.—Axis deer, Cervus axis.—Barasingha deer, Cervus duraveller, of the Himalayas.—Barbary deer, Cervus barbarus, the only true deer of Africa, found along the Mediterranean coast, from Tunis to the slopes of the Atlas range.—Cashmere deer, Cervus cashmirianus.—Fallow-deer, See Dama. The Mesopotamian fallow-deer is Dama mesopotamica.—Formosan deer, Cervus formosus.—Sambar deer, Cervus sambar.—Japanese deer, Cervus nippon.—Manchurian deer, Cervus manchuricus.—Moose deer, Cervus alces.—European deer, Cervus europaeus, of South America.—Fannalia deer, Cervus fannalia.—Parusian deer, Cervus parus.—Philippine deer, Cervus philippinus.—Pudu deer, Pudu pudu, of South America.—Red deer, the common stag, Cervus elaphus, a native of the forests of Europe and Asia where the climate is temperate. Red deer were in former times very abundant in the forests of England, and were special objects of the chase. They are still plentiful in the Highlands of Scotland, and care is taken in rearing them in the deer-parks throughout England. See stag.—Rusa deer, Cervus hippelaphus. See Rusa.—Sambar deer, Cervus ardiolatus.—Spotted deer. Same as axis, 1.—Timor deer, Cervus timorensis. (See also hog-deer, mule-deer, water-deer.)

deerberry (dēr'ber'i), n. [pl. deerberries (-iz).] 1. The aromatic wintergreen of America, Gaultheria procumbens.—2. The squaw-huckleberry, Vaccinium stamineum.—3. The partridge-berry, Mitella repens.

deer-fold (dēr'fōld), n. [*ME. *derfold, < AS. deor-feld, an inclosure for animals, < deor, an animal, + fald, a fold: see fold*.] A fold or park for deer.

deer-lick (dêr'lik), n. A spot of ground, naturally or artificially salt, which is resorted to by deer to nibble or lick the earth.

deer-mouse (dêr'mow), n. 1. A common name of the American jumping-mouse, Zapus ludovicianus, the only member of the family Zapodidae (which see): so called from its agility. It is a species about 4 inches long, with a longer scaly tail and enlarged hind quarters and hind feet, by means of which it clears several feet at a bound. The color is yellowish brown, darker on the back and paler below. It is generally distributed

Deer-mouse, or jumping mouse (Zapus ludovicianus) in woodland of the United States and British America.

2. A popular name of several species of true mice indigenous to North America, of the family Muridae and genus Hesperomys. It is especially applied to the common white-footed mouse (H. leucopus), which is of a grayish or yellowish brown color above, with snow-white under parts and paws, and the tail bicolored. It is about 3½ inches long, the tail less, and is very generally distributed in North America.

Deer-mouse or White-footed Mouse (Hesperomys leucopus)

deer-neck (dêr'nek), n. A thin, ill-formed neck, as of a horse.

deer-reserv (dêr'rêv), n. (One of two officers annually chosen by Massachusetts towns in the colonial period to execute the game-laws respecting deer.

deer's-hair, n. See deer-hair.

deerskin (dêr'skin), n. The hide of a deer, or leather made from such a hide.

deer-stalker (dêr'stâ'kêr), n. One who practices deer-stalking.

deer-stalking (dêr'stâ'king), n. The method or practice of hunting deer by stealing upon them unawares; still-hunting.

deer's-tongue (dêr's'tung), n. A composite plant, Trilisa odoratissima, of the United States, with rather fleshy leaves which are pleasantly fragrant when dry.

deer-tiger (dêr'ti'gêr), n. The cougar or puma, Felis concolor: so called from its tawny or fawn color.

5. To overcome in a contest of any kind, as a battle, fight, game, debate, competition, or election; vanquish; conquer; overthrow; rout; beat: as, to defeat an army; to defeat an opposing candidate; to defeat one's opponent at chess.

For to draw the King on, it was given out that the Pope had defeated all Manfried's Forces. Baker, Chronicles, p. 58.

—Syn. 5. Beat, Overpower, Overwhelm, Defeat, Discomfit, Rout, Overthrow, conquer. Beat is a general, somewhat indefinite, but vigorous word, covering the others. Overpower and overwhelm are the least creditable to the one that loses in the struggle: overpower is least permanent in its effects. To overpower is to overcome by superiority of strength or numbers, but the disadvantage may be changed by the arrival of reinforcements. To overwhelm is to bear down utterly, to sweep clear away by superior strength. Defeat is to overcome or get the better of in some kind of contest, and implies less discredit, but generally greater disaster, to the defeated party than beat, as that army is considered beaten which withdraws from the field. Defeat implies a serious disadvantage, because it applies more often to large numbers engaged. Discomfit has fallen into comparative disuse, except in its secondary sense of flogging, etc.; in that it expresses a comparatively complete and mortifying defeat. Rout is to defeat and drive off the field in confusion. Overthrow is the most decisive and final of these words; it naturally applies only to great persons, concerns, armies, etc. See conquer.

And though mine arms should conquer twenty worlds, There's a lean fellow beats all conquerors. Danby, Old Fortunatus.

Our Conqueror whom I now Of force believe almighty, since no less Than such could have o'erpow'rd such force as ours. Milton, P. L., I. 145.

Did seem defensible. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., II. 2.

defensible casemate. See casemate.
defensibleness (dē-fen'si-bl-nes), n. Defensibility.

The defensibleness of religion. Priestley.

defensibly, adv. [ME.; < defensible.] With arms of defense.

Eche of you in your owne persones defensibly armed. Pedro Letters, II. 422.

defensionist, n. [Early mod. E. also defension; < OF. defension, defension = Sp. defension = Pg. defensio = It. defensione, defensione, < ML. defensio (n.), defense, < L. defendere, pp. defensus, defend: see defend, defensor.] A defense.

No defension could take place, but all went by tyrannie and meere extortion. Puer, Martyr, p. 129.

defensive (dē-fen'siv), a. and n. [< OF. defensif, F. defensif = Pr. defensus = Sp. Pg. defensivo = It. defension, defensor, < ML. defensivus (tem. defensivus, < OF. defensive, a fortification), < L. defendere, pp. defensus, defend: see defend, defensor.] I. a. 1. Serving to defend; proper for defense: as, defensive armor.

The houses which are built are as warme and defensive against wind and weather as if they were tiled and slated. Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, II. 5.

Defensive arms lay by, as useless here,
Where massy balls the neighboring rocks do tear. Waller.

2. Of the nature of defense; consisting in resisting attack or aggression: as, defensive war, in distinction from offensive war, which is aggressive.

Since, therefore, we cannot win by an offensive war, at least a land-war, the model of our government seems naturally contrived for the defensive part. Dryden, Ded. of All for Love.

3. In a state or posture to defend: as, a defensive attitude.—Defensive allegation. See allegation.

II. n. That which defends or serves for defense; a safeguard; a security.

Containing a resolution politique, touching the femine government in monarchy; with a defensive of her Maj. honour and constancy.

Puttenham, Parthenolides, xiii.

Wars preventive, upon just fears, are true defenses.

Baron

The defensive, the state or attitude of defense; the state of being ready to meet or ward off attack.

Under these circumstances, the defensive, for the present, must be your only care. Lucas, in Raymond, p. 256.

To be on the defensive, or to stand on the defensive, to be or stand in a state or posture of defense or resistance, in opposition to aggression or attack.

From that time [the battle of Metaurus], for four more years, Hannibal could but stand on the defensive in the southernmost corner of the Italian peninsula.

Encyc. Brit., XI. 444.

defensively (dē-fen'siv-lī), adv. In a defensive manner; on the defensive; in defense.

Camalodunum, where the Romans had seated themselves to dwell pleasantly, rather than defensively, was not fortified.

Milton, Hist. Eng., II.

defensor (dē-fen'sor), n. [L., < defendere, pp. defensus, defend: see defend.] One who defends. Hence—(a) in Rom. law, a local magistrate of minor jurisdiction charged with the duty, among others, of appointing curators or guardians for infants having considerable estates. The name has also been applied to one who volunteered to represent in defense an absentee or incapable person. (b) in civil law. (1) A defendant. (2) One who took up the defense, and assumed the liability of a defendant. (3) An advocate, patron, procurator, or cognitor. (4) A curator or guardian. (c) in Canon law, the counsel and custodian of the property of a church.—Fidel Defensor. See Defender of the Faith, under defender.

defensory (dē-fen'sō-ri), a. [= OF. defensorie, defensorie, < ML. defensorius (neut. defensorium, a defense), < L. defendere, defend: see defend.] Tending to defend; defensive. Johnson.

defer (dē-fer'), v.; pret. and pp. deferred, ppr. deferring. [< OF. deferer, F. déferer = Sp. Pg. deferir = It. deferire, charge, accuse, intr. give way, < L. deferre (pp. delatus), bring down, bring before, give, grant, also (with acc. nomen = E. name) charge, accuse, < de, down, + ferre = E. bear. Cf. delect.] I. trans. 1. To offer; render; assign: as, to defer the command of an army.

The worship deferred to the Virgin. Brevint.

2. To refer; leave to another's judgment and determination.

The commissioners . . . deferred the matter unto the Earl of Northumberland. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 67.

II. intrans. To yield to another's opinion; submit in opinion: with to.

They not only deferred to his counsels in public assemblies, but he was moreover the umpire of domestic matters. Spence, tr. of Varilla's Hist. House of Medici (1696), p. 306.

You—whose stupidity and insolence I must defer to, soothe at every turn. Browning, King and Book, II. 278.

defer (dē-fer'), v.; pret. and pp. deferred, ppr. deferring. [An alteration, after defer, of differ, < ME. differren (rare), put off, < OF. differer, F. différer = Sp. Pg. diferir = It. deferre, differire, defer, delay, < L. differre (pp. dilatatus), carry different ways, scatter, put off, defer (intr. differ, be different, whence directly E. differ, < dis, apart, away, + ferre, carry, = E. bear: see differ, dilate, delay.] I. trans. 1. To delay; put off; postpone to a future time: as, to defer the execution of a design.

Soldiers, defer the spoil of the city until night. Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 7.

God,
Nothing more certain, will not loss defer
To vindicate the glory of his name. Milton, B. A., I. 674.

Why should we defer our joys?
B. Jonson, Volpone, III. 6.

2. To cause to wait; remand; put off: applied to persons.

[There was a] reason why he did not defer him at first for his answer, till some more of the magistrates and deputies might have been assembled.

Wentworth, Hist. New England, II. 128.

Deferred annuity. See annuity.—Deferred bonds, bonds issued by a government or company, entitling the holder to a gradually increasing rate of interest up to a specified rate, when they are converted into or classed as active bonds. Bithell, Counting-House Dict.—Deferred pay, an allowance of twopence per day paid to soldiers and non-commissioned officers serving in the British army on discharge, or payable on death. A similar allowance of twopence per day is paid annually to all men in the army reserve, any sum earned by a man dying during the year being paid to his representatives.—Deferred shares, shares issued by a company which do not entitle the holder to share in the profits until the expiration of a specified time or the occurrence of some event, as, for instance, when the ordinary shares are in the enjoyment of a given annual percentage of profit. Bithell.

II. intrans. To wait; delay; procrastinate.

Defer not till to-morrow to be wise;
To-morrow's sun to thee may never rise.
Congreve, To Cobham.

deference (dē-fēr-ens), n. [< F. déférence = Sp. Pg. deferencia = It. deferenza, < L. as if **deferentia*, < deferent (-t)s, ppr. of deferre, defer: see defer.] A yielding in opinion; submission to the opinion, judgment, or wish of another; hence, regard, respect, or submission in general: as, a blind deference to authority.

A natural roughness makes a man uncomplaisant to others; so that he has no deference for their inclinations, tempers, or conditions. Locke.

Adam's Speech, at parting with the Angel, has in it a Deference and Gratitude agreeable to an Interior Nature. Addison, Spectator, No. 345.

It would be much more difficult to produce examples of injury to a state from the too speedy termination of hostilities in deference to the public voice. Brougham.

When personal inquiry has been thorough, unbiased, and entire, it seems a violation of natural law to say that the inquirer should put it aside in deference to others, even of presumably superior qualification. Gladsstone, Might of Right, p. 190.

deferent (dē-fēr-ent), a. and s. [= F. différent = Sp. Pg. It. deferente, < L. deferens (-t)s, ppr. of deferre, carry down: see defer.] 1. a. Bearing off or away; carrying off; conveying away; specifically, in anat. and physiol., efferent: opposed to afferent: as, the deferent duct of the testes.

The figures of pipes, or canals, through which sounds pass, or the other bodies deferent, conduce to the variety and alteration of the sounds. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 230.

Deferent canal, the tube by which the seminal fluid of a male animal is conveyed from the testicles to the external sexual organs. Also called the efferent duct, or vas deferens.

II. s. 1. That which carries or conveys; a conductor.

Hard bodies refuse not altogether to be mediums of sounds. But all of them are dull and unapt deferents. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 217.

Specifically—2. A vessel or duct in the human body for the conveyance of fluids.—Deferent of the epicyclole, or simply the deferent (also called the orbit), in the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, a circle upon the circumference of which another circle was supposed to move, this second circle being called the epicyclole, and carrying the body of the planet.

It was in this simple and convincing manner that Copernicus accounted for the second inequality of the planets, by substituting the orbit of the earth for the three epicycloles of the superior planets and the two deferents of the inferior. Small.

deferential (dē-fēr-ē-shal), a. [= F. déférentiel, < L. as if **deferentialis*, < deferentia, < deferent (-t)s, ppr. of deferre: see deferent, deference.] 1. Expressing or characterized by deference; respectful in manner.

Their guilt is wrapped in deferential names. Lowell, Tempora Mutantur.

2. In anat., conveying away or carrying off; specifically, pertaining to the vas deferens, or deferent duct of the testes.

The deferential end of the testicular tube opens into a sac close to the anus. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 348.

deferentially (dē-fēr-ē-shal-lī), adv. In a deferential manner; with deference.

And did Sir Aylmer deferentially
With nearing chair and lower'd countenance think—
For people talk'd—that it was wholly wise?
Templeton, Aylmer's Field.

deferment (dē-fēr-mēnt), n. [< defer + -ment.] A putting off; postponement.

But, sir, my grief, joined with the instant business, Rags a deferment. Sir J. Shadlock.

deferter (dē-fēr-ēr), n. [< defer + -er.] One who postpones or puts off; a procrastinator.

A great deferter, long in hope, grown numb
With sloth, yet greedy still of what's to come.
B. Jonson, tr. of Horace's Art of Poetry.

deferret, v. t. [ME., < L. deferret, boil down, boil thoroughly, < de, down, + ferre, carry, boil: see ferret.] To boil down.

Deferret, carene, and aspe in oon manere
Of meat is made. Deferret of deferring Till thilke.

Palladius, Husbandrie (R. E. T. S.), p. 264.

deferrescence, deferrescency (dē-fēr-ves-ēns, -ēn-sī), n. [< L. deferrescens (-t)s, ppr. of deferescere, cease boiling, cool down, abate, < de, off, + ferescere, inceptive of fervere, boil: see ferret.] 1. Abatement of heat; the state of growing cool; coolness; lukewarmness. [Rare.]

Young beginners are . . . not so easily tempted to a recession, till after a long time, by a revolution of affections, they are abated by a deferrescence in holy actions. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1856), I. 108.

2. In pathol., abatement or decrease of fever or feverish symptoms.

All goes well, though slowly; and as completeness is more precious than rapidity of cure, we must be content to mark time and watch gratefully the process of deferrescence, which is proceeding satisfactorily. London Times.

defeudalise (dē-fū-dal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. defeudalsed, ppr. defeudalising. [< de, priv. + feudalise.] To deprive of feudal character or form.

defeat, a. [OF., pp. of defaire, defaire, undo, defeat: see defeat.] In her., same as decapit. defeat (dē-fī), adv. A corrupt form of defly.

They dauncen defly, and singen scoote. Spenser, Rhep. Cal., April.

defiable, a. [ME. dyffiable; < defy + -able.] Digestible.

And he must drawe him to places of swete ayre and hungry; and ete nourishable meates and dyffiable also. Juliana Berners, Treatyse of Fynnyngye wyth an Angle, [fol. 1, back.

defiance (dē-fī-ans), n. [< ME. defyaunce, < OF. defiance, defiance, defiance, F. defiance (= Pr. defiansa = OSP. defiansa = It. diffidenza, diffidenza, diffidanza, < ML. diffidentia, diffidantia, lack of faith, distrust, defiance, < L. diffiden (-t)s, ppr. of diffidere, ML. also diffidare, distrust, defy: see defiant, diffident, and cf. diffidence, ult. a doublet of defiance.] 1. Suspicion; mistrust.

Major Holmes, who I perceive would fain get to be free and friends with my wife, but I shall prevent it, and she herself hath also a defiance against him. Pope, Diary, I. 245.

2. The act of one who defies; a challenge to fight; an invitation to combat; a call to an adversary to fight if he dare.

As two contentious Kings, that, on each little jar,
Defiances send forth, proclaiming open war.
Drayton, Polyolion, III. 100.

He then commanded his trumpeter to sound a defiance to his challengers. Scott.

3. A challenge to meet in any contest; a call upon one to make good any assertion or charge; an invitation to maintain any cause or point.—

4. Contempt of opposition or danger; a daring or resistance that implies contempt of an adversary, or disregard of any opposing force: as, he pressed forward in defiance of the storm.

Pride in their port, defiance in their eye,
I see the lords of human kind pass by.
Goldsmith, Traveller, I. 337.

Their towers that looked defiance at the sky,
Fallen by their own vast weight, in fragments lie. Bryant, Ruins of Italic.

It is one thing to like defiance, and another thing to like its consequences. George Eliot, Middlemarch, II. 41.

To bid defiance to, or to set at defiance, to defy; brave: as, to bid defiance to ridicule or criticism; to set public opinion at defiance.

He bids defiance to the gaping crowd. Granville.

defiant (dē-fī-ant), a. [< OF. defiant, defiant, F. défiant = Pr. defiant = OSP. defiante = It. diffidente, diffidente, < L. diffident (-t)s, distrustful, defiant, ppr. of diffidere, distrust, ML. also diffidare, distrust, defy, > OF. defer, F. défer, defy: see defy, diffide, and cf. diffident, ult. a doublet of defiant.] Characterized by defiance, or bold opposition or antagonism; challenging.

He spoke first to Mary Stuart, who, half frightened, half defiant, found herself on the edge of a conflict to which her own resources were manifestly inadequate. Fraser, Hist. Eng., Reign of Elizabeth, ix.

defiantly (dē-fī-ant-lī), adv. In a defiant manner; with defiance.

defiantness (dē-fī-ant-nēs), n. The state or quality of being defiant.

He answered, not raising his voice, but speaking with quick defiantness. George Eliot, Middlemarch, Ixi.

defiatory (dē-fī-ō-ri), a. [Improp. < defy + -atory.] Bidding or bearing defiance.

Letters deflatory. Shelford, Learned Discourses (1682), p. 278.

defibrinate (dē-fī-brī-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. defibrinated, ppr. defibrinating. [< de, priv. + fibrin + -ate.] To defibrinate.

defibrination (dē-fī-brī-nā-shn), n. The act or process of defibrinating, or depriving of fibrin. defibrinate (dē-fī-brī-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. defibrinated, ppr. defibrinating. [< de, priv. + fibrin + -ate.] To deprive of fibrin; specif-stem of certain parts of definir, define: see de- fine, and cf. finish.] To define. Chaucer.

definite, a. Definitum, of definitum.

definite (def'i-nit), a. and n. [= OF. definitus, F. definit = Sp. definito = Pg. It. definito, < L. definitus, limited, definite, pp. of definere, limit, define; see define.] L. a. 1. Having fixed limits; bounded with precision; determinate: as, definite dimensions; definite measure.

In the Bible, the highest heaven is certainly a definite place, where God's presence is specially manifested, although at the same time it pervades the whole universe. Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 69.

2. Expressly or precisely prescribed, fixed, or established.

It was too much the habit of English politicians to take it for granted that there was in India a known and definite constitution by which questions of this kind were to be decided. Narayan, Warren Hastings.

Before any definite agency for social control is developed, there exists a control arising partly from the public opinion of the living, and more largely from the public opinion of the dead. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 467.

3. Having clear limits in signification; determinate; certain; precise: as, a definite word, term, or expression.—4. Fixed; determinate; exact.

Some certain and definite time. Ayliffe, Farquhar.

A jar of water, if you shake it, has a perfectly definite time in which it oscillates, and that is very easily measured. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 201.

5. In gram., defining; limiting: applied to the article the and its correspondents in other languages.—6. In bot.: (a) Of a constant number, not exceeding twenty: as, stamens definite. (b) Limited in development: as, a definite inflorescence. See centrifugal inflorescence, under centrifugal.—Definite proportions, in chem., the relative quantities in which bodies unite to form compounds. Also called combining proportions, chemical equivalents, or equivalents. See equivalent, and atomic theory, under atom.—Definite term, in logic, a term which defines or marks out a particular class of beings, or a single person, as distinguished from an indefinite term, which does not define or mark out an object.—Syn. Definite, Definitive, clear. The first two are sometimes confounded, especially in the adverbial form, and they often cover essentially the same idea. He spoke definitely—that is, with his meaning sharply defined; he answered definitively—that is, so as to define or decide with certainty. Definite is passive, definitive active.

II. n. [ML. definitum, neut. of L. definitus, definite.] A thing defined. Ayliffe. [Rare or obsolete.]

definitely (def'i-nit-ly), adv. In a definite manner.

definiteness (def'i-nit-ness), n. The quality of being definite or defined in extent or signification; exactness; determinateness.

The right word is always a power, and communicates its definiteness to our action. George Eliot, Middlemarch, I. 330.

definition (def-i-nish'on), n. [= OF. definition, definiō, F. définition = Sp. definición = Pg. definição = It. definizione = D. definitie = G. Defin. Sw. definition, < L. definitio(n), a definition (tr. Gr. ὑπόθεσις, < ὑπο, define, limit: see hypothesis), < define, define: see define.] 1. The determination of the limits or outlines of a thing; a marking out; the state of being clearly marked out or outlined; specifically, in optics, the defining power of a lens—that is, its ability to give a clear, distinct image of an object in all its important details. This depends upon the freedom of the lens from spherical and chromatic aberration.

The day was clear, and every mound and peak traced its outline with perfect definition against the sky. O. F. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 255.

Of course, every one who is in the habit of using a telescope in the daytime is familiar with the fact, that on many seemingly cloudless days there is an otherwise invisible kind of haze, which impairs or destroys definition, and that the best or brightest vision is obtained in the blue sky visible between large, floating annuli. Science, IV. 94.

2. The act of stating the signification of a word or phrase, or the essential properties of a thing.

Definition is so closely connected with classification that, until the nature of the latter process is in some measure understood, the former cannot be discussed to much purpose. J. S. Mill, Logic, I. viii. § 1.

Enthusiastically attached to the name of liberty, these historians troubled themselves little about its definition. Macaulay, History.

3. A statement of the signification of a word or phrase, or of what is essential to the conception of any given thing; an explanation of how any given kind is distinguished from all other kinds.

Three conceptions of the nature of definition have prevailed at different times: (1) Aristotle taught that every strict definition consists of two parts, different in kind, one declaring the genus or higher class to which the species defined belongs, the other declaring the specific difference by which the given species differs from others of the same genus. This view influences most of the definitions of systematic botany and zoology. (2) The theory of logical extension and comprehension, coming into vogue on the overthrow of Aristotelianism and obtaining its extreme development in the formal logic of Kant and his followers, made the definition a mere list of essential marks all standing upon one footing and aggregated together without any distinction between genus and difference. This, being an extremely nominalistic view, answers very well for the definitions of some artificial classes in mathematics, etc. (3) Modern logicians, recognizing that the elements of a definition are neither, in general, merely joined together without order nor always combined on one fixed model, conceive the definition to be an explanation of the construction of the concept to be defined out of others better known. According to the two first views alike, some concepts are indefinable because so abstract that no wider ones embracing them can be found; according to the third, no concept can be too abstract to admit of definition, the only indefinable ideas being such as the sensation of redness, the sense of fear, and the like, which direct experience alone can impart. An example of definitions conforming to the third conception is: "An uncle is the son of a parent of a parent"—a definition in which the notions of son and parent neither stand in the relation of genus and difference nor are merely aggregated together. Such also is the definition "Substance is the permanent element in the phenomenon."

Though definitions will serve to explain the names of substances as they stand for our ideas, yet they leave them not without great imperfection as they stand for things. Locke, Human Understanding, III. xi. 24.

Abundant definition, a definition which specifies characters which might be omitted without widening the class of things to which the definition applies.—Accidental definition, a description.—Adequate definition or mark, a definition which applies to every individual of the class defined, and to no other.—Analytical definition, a definition expressing an analysis of a notion already formed, and embodied in a word or phrase already in use.—Causal definition. See causal.—Circle in definition. See circle.—Conceptual definition, the analysis of a concept; the exact setting forth of the contents of a notion.—Descriptive definition, a definition which designates the thing defined by means of inessential attributes.—Essential definition, a strict definition stating the true constitutive essence of the definitum.—Nominal definition, an explanation of the meaning of a word.—Real definition, the statement of the design or idea of a real kind. Thus, any artificial object, as a sewing-machine, is defined by stating the purpose and the nature of the contrivance by which the purpose is intended to be attained. The real definition of a natural species supposes the species to owe its being to some intelligible idea which the definition attempts to state.—Synthetical definition, a definition expressing the mode of constructing a new conception; a definition for a new term therein proposed, or for a new sense proposed for an old word.

definitional (def-i-nish'on-ly), a. [Definition + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to definition; used in defining.

Two distinct presentations are necessary to the comparison that is here implied; but we cannot begin with such definitional differentiation: we must first recognize our objects before we can compare them. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 49.

2. Abounding in definitions.

definitive (dē-fin'i-tiv), a. and n. [= F. definitif = Sp. Pg. It. definitivo = D. definitief = G. Def. Sw. definitiv, < L. definitivus, definitive, explanatory, L.L. definitus, < definitus, pp. of definere, define: see define.] L. a. 1. Limiting the extent; determinate; positive; express: as, a definitive term.

Other authors often write dubiously, even in matters wherein is expected a strict and definitive truth. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

I had been subject to attacks of the singular disorder which physicians have agreed to term cataplexy, in default of a more definitive title. Peet, Tales, I. 332.

2. Ending; determining; final; conclusive: opposed to conditional, provisional, or interlocutory.

My lord, you know it is in vain; For the Queen's sentence is definitive, And we must see 't performed. Haywood, If You Know not Me, I.

With the four volumes first mentioned the Goethe Society in Weimar begins the publication of the definitive edition of Goethe's works. Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 484.

They [treaties] may be principal or accessory, preliminary or definitive. Woolsey, Intro. to Inter. Law, § 102.

Specifically—(a) In bot., completely formed; fixed and finished: opposed to primitive or formative: as, the definitive ovule; a definitive anther. Huxley. (b) In logic, applied to a judgment which is accompanied by a full assent of the mind.

To these two methods Galen addeth the third method, that is, method divisive or definitive. Branderlinde.

3. In metaph., having position without occupying space.

Definitive and circumscriptive—the distinction whereby theologians, that deny God to be in any place, save themselves from being accused of saying that he is nowhere. Hobbes.

Definitive location, in metaph., position without extension in space.—Definitive whole, the compound of a generic character and a specific difference; a metaphysical whole.—Syn. See definite.

II. n. In gram., a defining or limiting word, as an article, a demonstrative, or the like.

definitively (dē-fin'i-tiv-ly), adv. 1. Determinately; positively; expressly.

Definitively thus I answer you. Shak., Rich. III., III. 7.

The strong and decided policy to which Republicans throughout the country had definitively committed themselves. The American, IX. 343.

2. Finally; conclusively: as, the points between the parties are definitively settled.

No man, no synod, no session of men, though call'd the church, can judge definitively the sense of Scripture to another man's conscience. Milton, Civil Power.

3. So as to have or exist in a definitive location (which see, under definitive).

definitiveness (dē-fin'i-tiv-ness), n. Determinateness; decisiveness; conclusiveness.

At length I would be avenged; this was a point definitively settled—but the very definitiveness with which it was resolved precluded the idea of risk. Peet, Tales, I. 346.

definitude (dē-fin'i-tūd), n. [L. as if "definitudo, < definitus, definite: see definite.] Definiteness; exactitude; precision.

Though thus destitute of the light and definitude of mathematical representations, philosophy is allowed no adequate language of its own. Sir W. Hamilton.

definitum (def-i-ni'tum), n.; pl. definita (-tā). [ML.] A thing defined. See definite, n.

defix (dē-fiks'), v. t. [L. defixus, pp. of defigere, fasten down, fix, < de, down, + figere, fasten: see fix.] To fix; fasten.

The country parson is generally sad [sober] because he knows nothing but the cross of Christ, his mind being defixed on and with those nails wherewith his Master was. G. Herbert, Country Parson, xxvii.

deflagrability (def'lā-grā-bil'i-ti), n. [Deflagrable: see deflagrate.] In chem., combustibility; the quality of taking fire and burning away.

We have been forced to spend much more time than the opinion of the ready deflagrability (if I may so speak) of saltpetre did beforehand permit us to imagine. Boyle, Works, I. 362.

deflagrable (def'lā- or dē-flā-grā-bl), a. [L. as if "deflagrabilis, < deflagrare, burn: see deflagrate.] Combustible; having the quality of taking fire and burning up, as alcohol, oils, etc.

Our chymical oils, supposing that they were exactly pure, yet . . . they would be . . . but the more inflammable and deflagrable. Boyle, Works, I. 353.

deflagrate (def'lā-grāt), v.; pret. and pp. deflagrated, ppr. deflagrating. [L. deflagratus, pp. of deflagrare, burn, consume, < de + flagrare, burn: see flagrant.] I. trans. To set fire to; burn; consume: as, to deflagrate oil or spirit.

A secondary condenser is always used for spectroscopic experiments, as the spark has great deflagrating power. J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., II. 53.

II. intrans. To burn; burst into flame; specifically, to burn rapidly, with a sudden evolution of flame and vapor, as a mixture of charcoal and niter thrown into a red-hot crucible.

Deflagrating mixture, combustible mixture, generally made with niter, the oxygen of which is the active ingredient in promoting their combustion.

deflagration (def-lā-grā'shon), n. [= F. déflagration = Sp. deflagración = Pg. deflagração = It. deflagrazione, < L. deflagratio(n), < deflagrare, burn up: see deflagrate.] A kindling or setting on fire; burning; combustion.

Specifically—(a) Oxidation by the rapid combustion of a substance, attended with an extremely sudden evolution of flame and vapor. It is accomplished by mixing the substance with potassium chlorate or nitrate (niter), and projecting the mixture in small portions at a time into a red-hot crucible. (b) The rapid combustion of metals by the electric spark.

deflagrator (def'lā-grā-tor), n. [= F. déflagrateur = Sp. deflagrador, < NL. deflagrator, < L. deflagrare, burn up: see deflagrate.] An instrument for producing combustion, particularly the combustion of metallic substances by means of the electric spark.—Barre's deflagrator, a voltaic cell in which the copper and zinc plates are large and are wound closely together in a spiral form, and hence offer large surface and proportionally small internal resistance. It can, therefore, produce powerful heating effects in a short external circuit.

deflate (dē-flāt'), v. t. [de + flate. Cf. inflate.] (Recent.) To remove the air from: the opposite of inflate.

deflation (dē-flā'shon), n. The act of deflating. (Recent.)

deflect (dē-flekt'), v. [= F. défléchir, < L. deflectere, bend aside, < de, away, + flectere, bend: see flex, flexible.] I. trans. To cause to turn aside; turn or bend from a right line or a regular course.

Since the Glacial Epoch there have been no changes in the physical geography of the earth sufficient to deflect the Pole half-a-degree miles, far less half-a-degree degrees. J. Croft, Climate and Cosmology, p. 3.

The foreign policy of the Tury party was hardly more deflected by discommodities than that of their adversaries.

Locky, Eng. in 18th Cent., I.

A beam is always deflected, whatever be the load it supports.

R. Z. Bell, Expt. Mechanism, p. 128.

Deflecting magnet. See magnet.

II. Intrans. To turn away or aside; deviate from a true course or a right line; swerve.

At some part of the Arcus it [the needle] deflecteth not, but lieth in the true meridian.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 2.

All those actions which deflect and err from the order of this end are unnatural and inordinate.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 7.

His suicide . . . is in no respect an unaccountable circumstance, or one which need cause us to deflect from the line of ordinary analysis.

Poe, Tales, I. 241.

deflected (dē-flek'ted), p. a. Turned aside or from a direct line or course; specifically, in bot. and zool., bent abruptly downward.

deflection (dē-flek'shən), n. [Prop. but less commonly spelled deflexion; = F. deflexion = Pg. deflexão = It. deflessione, < L.L. deflectio (n-), a bending aside, < L. deflectus, pp. of deflectere, bend aside: see deflect.] 1. The act of turning or the state of being turned aside from a straight line or course; a turning from a true line or the regular course; deviation.

Needles . . . at the very line . . . stand without deflection.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 2.

They traverse even the largest faults, and cross from one group of rocks into another without interruption or deflection.

Geikie, Geol. Sketches, II. 23.

2. Figuratively, deviation from the right, regular, or expected course of action or thought; aberration.

I find no sufficient or competent collection of the works of nature which have a digression and deflection from the ordinary course. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 121.

King David found out the deflection and indirectness of our minds.

W. Montague, Devoutness Essay, I. 112.

Specifically—3. Naut., the deviation of a ship from her true course in sailing.—4. In optics, a deviation of the rays of light toward the surface of an opaque body; inflection. See diffraction.

The deflections which the rays proceeding from any point experience are proportional to the distances of the points of incidence from the axis of the mirror.

Loomer, Light (trans.), p. 54.

5. In elect., the deviation or swing of a magnetic needle from the zero of its position: often measured in degrees.—6. In math.: (a) The distance by which a curve departs from another curve, or from a straight line. (b) Any effect either of curvature or of discontinuous change of direction.—7. In mech., the bending of material under a transverse strain, as of a beam under the weight of a load.—8. In entom.: (a) The state of being bent downward: as, a deflection of the side of the pronotum. (b) A deflected part or margin.

deflective (dē-flek'tiv), a. [deflect + -ive.] Causing deflection or deviation.—Deflective forces, in mech., those forces which act upon a moving body in a direction different from that in which it actually moves, in consequence of which it is made to deviate from its course.

deflectometer (dē-flek'tom'e-tēr), n. [Irreg. < L. deflector, deflect, + metrum, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the deflection of a rail by a weight in rapid motion. E. H. Knight.

deflector (dē-flek'tor), n. [deflect + -or.] 1. A plate, diaphragm, or cone in a lamp, furnace, or stove, to bring the flame and gases into intimate contact and improve the combustion. E. H. Knight.—2. A device for causing the nose of a hydraulic mining machine to move in any desired direction.

deflex (dē-flek's), v. t. [L. deflexus, pp. of deflectere, turn aside: see deflect.] To turn aside; deflect; specifically, in zool., to bend down.

I have noticed that the smaller species, during flight, deflex the extremity of their antennæ.

Westwood.

deflexed (dē-flek'ted), p. a. [deflex + -ed.] Deflected; specifically, in zool., bent down: as, a deflexed margin.—Deflexed antennæ, antennæ which have the apical portion constantly bent downward, as in many Diptera.—Deflexed wings, wings which, in repose, cover the body like a roof, the internal edges of the primaries meeting and the surfaces sloping down on both sides, as in many moths and Hemiptera.

deflexion, n. See deflection.

deflexure (dē-flek'shūr), n. [deflex + -ure: see flexure.] A turning aside or bending; deviation.

deflorate (dē-flō'rāt), a. [= F. defloré = Sp. deflorado = Pg. deflorado = It. deflorato, < L.L. defloratus, pp. of deflorare, deprive of flowers, deflower: see deflower.] In bot.: (a) Having lost its flowers: said of a plant. (b) Having shed its pollen: said of an anther. defloration (dē-flō'rā'shən), n. [= F. defloration = Sp. defloración = Pg. defloração = It. deflorazione, < L.L. defloratio (n-), < deflorare, deflower: see deflorate.] 1. The act of deflowering; the act of depriving of the flower.—2. A selection of the flower or most valuable part of anything.

The laws of Normandy are, in a great measure, the defloration of the English laws.

Sir M. Hale.

3. The act of depriving of virginity; ravishment; rape.

deflower, v. t. See deflower.

deflowt (dē-flō't), v. t. [L. de, down, + E. flow, after L. fluere, flow down. See de- and flow, and cf. fluant, defluent.] To flow down.

Some superfluous matter deflowing from the body.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 4.

deflower, deflower (dē-flō'ér, dē-flō'úr), v. t. [ME. deflowren, defloren, < OF. deflorir, deflorir, deflower, deflower, deflower, F. deflorer = Pr. deflorar = Sp. deflorar = Pg. deflorar = It. deflorare, < L.L. deflorare, deprive of flowers, deflower, < de- priv. + fluere (flu-), a flower: see flower and flow.] 1. To deprive or strip of flowers, or of the qualities or character of a flower.

Bending the cedars, deflowering the gardens.

W. Montague, Devoutness Essay, I. xix. § 6.

Thrice had he pierced his target in the eye At fifty paces; twice deflowered a rose, Striking each time the very leaf he chose.

A. H. Stoddard, Skork and Ruby.

Hence—2. To despoil of beauty or grace; spoil the appearance or nature of; damage; vitiate.

Now grisly Hair deflowers his polish'd skin, Shewing what he to Katsya is of kin.

J. Beaumont, Pyche, II. 171.

He died . . . before the sweetness of his soul was deflowered.

Jer. Taylor.

3. To deprive of virginity; ravish; violate. deflowerer (dē-flō'ér-ér), n. One who deflowers.

Bp. Bale.

defluency (dē-flū'en-si), n. [defluent: see defluent, and cf. fluency.] Fluidity; flow.

The cold having taken away the defluency of the oil, . . . there appeared cylinders consisting partly of concentered oil.

Boyle, Hist. of Cold, xxi.

defluent (dē-flū'nt), a. [L. defluens (t-), pp. of defluere, flow down, < de, down, + fluere, flow: see fluant.] Running downward; decurrent: specifically used in botany.

defluuous (dē-flū'ūs), a. [L. defluuus, flowing down, < defluere, flow down: see defluent.] Flowing down; falling off. Bailey.

defluvium (dē-flū'vi-um), n. [L., a flowing down, a falling off, < defluere, flow down: see defluent.] A falling off, as of the hair or the bark of a tree, from disease.

deflux (dē-flūks), n. [= Sp. deflugo = Pg. deflugo = It. deflusso, < L.L. defluxus, a flowing down or off, < L. defluere, pp. defluxus, flow down or off: see defluent.] A flowing down; a running downward.

All impostumes engendered either by way of gathering and collection of humors, or by some deflux and rheumatic descent.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxii. 25.

defluxion (dē-flūk'shən), n. [= F. defluxion = Pg. defluzão, < L.L. defluxio (n-), < L. defluere, pp. defluxus, flow down: see deflux, defluent.] In med., a flowing, running, or falling of humors or fluid matter from an upper to a lower part of the body; a discharge or flowing off of humors: as, a defluxion from the nose or head in catarrh: sometimes used as synonymous with inflammation, from the increased flow of blood (hyperemia) to an inflamed part.

Home, and there find my wife making of tea; a drink which Mr. Pelling, the Pottery, tells her is good for her cold and defluxions.

Pope, Diary, III. 175.

I have been much impaired in my health, by a defluxion which fell into one of my legs, caused by a slight scratch on my shin-bone.

Swain, To Mr. Wotton.

defly, adv. A corrupt form of defly.

defoliation, n. See defoliation.

defoliate, v. t. [F. defouiller (cf. Sp. deshojar = Pg. desfoliar = It. disfogliare, < M.L. **desfoliare*, < M.L. defoliare, deprive of leaves: see defoliate and foliate.] To strip the leaves from.

Over and beside, in disturbing and defoliating a vine, you must beware how you pluck off those boughs that are like to bear the grapes, or to go with it.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xvii. 22.

defoliate, v. t. [ME. defoulen, var. of defoulen, < OF. defouir, etc.; see defoul.] To trample under foot.

defoliate, n. [ME.; < defouir, v.] A trampling under foot.

There was fighting, there was toiling, And under horn knights defoliate.

Arthur and Merlin, I. 7999.

defoliate (dē-flō'li-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. defoliated, ppr. defoliating. [cf. M.L. defoliatu, pp. of defoliare, shed leaves, < L. de- priv. + folium, a leaf: see foliate.] To deprive of leaves; cut or pluck off the leaves of.

The swarms of more robust May beetles (Leachinosterna fusca), which begin to defoliate oak groves and poplar trees.

Science, IV. 567.

defoliate (dē-flō'li-āt), a. [cf. M.L. defoliatu, pp.: see the verb.] Deprived of leaves; having cast its leaves.

defoliation (dē-flō'li-ā'shən), n. [= F. defoliation (cf. Pg. defoliazione), < M.L. **defoliatio* (n-), < defoliare, defoliate: see defoliate.] Loss of leaves, as by the depredations of insects; specifically, the fall of leaves in autumn.

The fallation and defoliation of trees.

Nature, XXX. 554.

defoliator (dē-flō'li-ā-tor), n. [= Sp. deshojador = Pg. desfolhador; as defoliate + -or.] That which defoliates or strips of verdure; specifically, in entom., an insect which destroys the leaves of trees.

deforce (dē-fōrs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deforced, ppr. deforcing. [cf. OF. deforcer, deforcer, deforcer, deforcer, < M.L. difforsare, difforsare, take away by violence, < dis- (OF. des-, de-) + fora (> OF. foras), force: see force.] In law: (a) To withhold from or keep out of lawful possession, as of an estate.

Putting and establishing armed men in towns, castles, and other places to defend the land against him, to deforce him of his fee.

Holmes, Edw. I., an. 1295.

(b) In Scots law, to resist (an officer of the law in the execution of his official duty).

The herald was evil treated in the execution of his summons, and was manifestly deforced, and his letters riven.

Pitcairne, Chron. of Scotland (ed. 1795), p. 127.

deforce (dē-fōrs'), n. Deforcement.

deforcement (dē-fōrs'ment), n. [cf. OF. deforcement (cf. M.L. deforcamentum), < deforcer, deforce: see deforce and ment.] In law: (a) The withholding of lands or tenements to which another person has a right. It implies that the latter has not had possession.

Keeping a man . . . out of a freehold office is construed to be a deforcement.

Blackstone, Com., III. 19.

(b) In Scots law, a resisting of an officer engaged in the execution of the law.

deforcitor (dē-fōr'shūr), n. [Also written deforcior, deforcior, deforcior; < OF. deforcior, < deforcer, deforce.] An obsolete form of deforciant.

deforciant (dē-fōr'shiant), n. [cf. OF. deforciant, ppr. of deforcior, deforce: see deforce.] In law: (a) One who keeps out of possession the rightful owner of an estate. (b) A person against whom a fictitious action was brought in fine and recovery: abolished by 3 and 4 Wm. IV., c. 74.

In levying a fine of lands, the person against whom the fictitious action is brought upon a supposed breach of covenant is called the deforciant.

Blackstone, Com., III. 19.

deforestation (dē-fōr-estā'shən), n. [cf. M.L. as if **deforestatio* (n-), < deforestare, deforce: see deforce.] In law, a distress; a seizure of goods for the satisfaction of a lawful debt.

deforest (dē-fōr'est), v. t. [cf. de- priv. + forest. Cf. disforest.] To deprive of forests; cut down and clear away the forests of.

The settlement of the country and general deforesting of such a large portion of it have driven these hawks to more retired parts during the nesting-season.

Pap. Sci. M., XXVIII. 642.

deforestation (dē-fōr-estā'shən), n. [cf. deforest + -ation.] The act of cutting down and clearing away the forests of a region or a tract of land.

Reasons may be assigned for the decreased fertility: for instance, drought resulting from the decay of irrigation works, or from reckless deforestation, and the production of marshes from the want of river-levees.

Pap. Sci. M., XIII. 292.

deform<sup>1</sup> (dē-fōrm'), v. t. [cf. ME. deformen, deformen, < OF. deformar, F. déformer = Sp. Pg. deformar = It. deformare, deformare; < L. de- priv. + forma, shape: see form.] 1. To change or alter the form of; convert into a new form or shape.

One of the above forms [of knot] cannot be deformed into a circle.

Encyc. Brit., XIV. 127.

Specifically—2. To mar the natural form or shape of; put out of shape; disfigure, as by malformation of a limb or some other part of the body.

A traveller, one so made out of the mixture of shreds of forms, that himself is truly deformed.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, II. 1

Whose work is without labour, whose designs
No flaw deform, no difficulty thwarts,
And whose beneficence no charge exhausts

Cowper, Task, vi. 229.

The propensity to deform, or alter from the natural form of some part of the body, is one which is common to human nature in every aspect in which we are acquainted with it.

W. H. Flower, Fashion in Deformity, p. 1.

8. To render ugly, ungraceful, or displeasing; mar the beauty of; spoil: as, to deform the person by unbecoming dress; to deform the character by vicious conduct.

Old men with dust deformed their hoary hair. Dryden.

Fury will deform the finest Face.

Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

Our prose had at length worked itself clear from those quaint conceits which still deformed almost every metrical composition.

Massey, Dryden.

deform<sup>1</sup> (dê-fôr'm'), v. [ME. deformare, < OF. deformare, F. difforme = Sp. Pg. deformar = It. difforme, < L. deformis, a., deformed, < de-priv. + forma, shape: see deform, v.] Disfigured; being of an unnatural, distorted, or disproportioned form; displeasing to the eye.

Sight so deform what heart of rock could long

Deformed [L. deformata] by letters in stanzas.

Wyclif, 2 Cor. iii. 7.

deformability (dê-fôr-ma-bil'i-ti), n. [< deformable: see -bility.] Capacity for change of form; pliability.

Preliminary to deformability and elasticity.

Nature, XXXVII. 164.

deformable (dê-fôr-ma-bl), a. [< deform<sup>1</sup> + -able.] Capable of being deformed; capable of change of form.

deformaset, a. [ME., < L. deformatus, pp. of deformare, deform: see deform<sup>1</sup>, v.] Deformed.

And when she saw her visage so deformet,

If she in hart were wo, I ne wite, God wate.

In spite of the almost incredible deformation of the individual characters, the Arabic script has remained true to all the really essential characteristics of the primitive Semitic writing.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, l. 166.

When its eggs are becoming mature, it finds its way into one of these capsules and there undergoes a remarkable deformation.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 450.

2. An altered form.

Lepsius, who considers Middle African languages as deformations of Bantu languages.

Osw., Mod. Langs. of Africa, p. 59.

3. Deformity; disfigurement. — 4. In geom. and mech., a change of shape of a body or surface without any breach of the continuity of its parts, and generally without any alteration of the size of them; relative displacement of parts; strain.

The energy actually expended in the deformation of inelastic substances during an impact.

Amer. Jour. Sci., Whole No. cxxx., p. 197.

Annular deformation of the skull, an artificial deformation of the skull produced by pressure applied behind the bregma and under the chin — Ossiform deformation of the skull, an artificial deformation of the skull produced by frontal and occipital pressure.

deformed (dê-fôr'md'), p. a. [*ME. *deformed, deformed; pp. of deform<sup>1</sup>, v.*] 1. Having the form changed, with loss of natural symmetry or beauty; disfigured; distorted; crooked.

A Monster is a thing deformed agen Kynde both of Man or of Best or of any thing elles . . . and that is cleped a Monster

Mandeville, Travels, p. 67.

Cheated of feature by dissembling nature,
Deform d, unfinish d, sent before my time

Into this breathing world, scarce half made up.

Specifically — 2. In entom., exhibiting unusual protuberances or swellings. — 3. Morally ugly; base; depraved.

From the rod and ferule I would have them free, as from the menace of them; for it is both deformed and vile.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

You se'er injured me, and that doth make

My crime the more deformed.

Shirley, Grateful Servant, III. 1.

Deformed antennae, antennae in which one or more joints are greatly developed over the rest; generally restricted to cases where the special development is confined to one sex; if it is common to both sexes, the antennae are said to be irregular. — Myx. 1. Misshapen, unsightly, ill-favored.

deformedly (dê-fôr'med-li), adv. In a deformed or disfiguring manner.

With these [rags] deformedly to quilt and interlace the entire, the spangles, and undying robe of truth.

Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

deformedness (dê-fôr'med-nes), n. The state of being deformed.

deformer (dê-fôr'mér), n. One who deforms or disfigures.

They are now to be remov'd, because they have been the most certain deformers and ruiners of the Church.

Milton, On Det. of Humb. Remount.

deformity (dê-fôr'mi-ti), n. [< OF. deformité, deformité, deformité, F. difformité = Sp. deformidad = Pg. deformidade = It. deformità, deformità, < L. deformitas(-e), deformity, < deformis, deformed: see deform<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. Physical malformation or distortion; disproportion or unnatural development of a part or parts. The commonest external deformities of the person are humpback, clubfoot, inequality of limbs, harelip, and squinting.

To make an envious mountain on my back,
Where sits deformity to mock my body.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., III. 2.

The practice of turning out the toes, so much insisted on by dancing masters, when it becomes habitual is a deformity.

W. H. Flower, Fashion in Deformity, p. 77.

2. Lack of that which constitutes, or the presence of that which destroys, beauty, grace, or propriety; irregularity; absurdity; gross deviation from established rules: as, deformity in an edifice; deformity of character. — 3. Lack of uniformity or conformity.

Better it were to have a deformity in preaching, . . . than to have such a uniformity that the silly people should be thereby occasioned to continue still in their lamentable ignorance.

Lutwiler, Sermons and Remains, II. 247.

Whether the ministers pray before they study, or study before they pray, there must needs be infinite deformity in the public worship, and all the benefits which before were the consequences of conformity and unity will be lost.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 299.

deformist, deformist, n. See deformator.

deformist (dê-fôr'mist), n. [*< L. as if *deformis(n-), < deformis, pp. of deformere, dig down, bury in the earth, < de-, down, + fodere, dig: see foss, fossil.*] The punishment of being buried alive.

defoul<sup>1</sup> (dê-foul'), v. t. [ME. defoulen (a var. of defoulen, E. defile, q. v.), < de- + foulen, make foul: see foul, v., and cf. defile<sup>1</sup>, defile<sup>2</sup>, v.] To make foul or unclean; befoul; defile.

Ther was grete defouling of men and horse; but there the xij fellows shewed mervelles with her bodies.

Milton, S. A., l. 419.

degenerateness (dē-jen'g-rāt-nēs), n. A degenerate state; a state in which natural or original qualities are decayed or lost.

degeneration (dē-jen'g-rā'shən), n. [= F. dégénération = Sp. degeneración = Pg. degeneração = It. degenerazione, < L. as if **degeneratio* (n.), < degenerare, degenerate.] 1. A loss or impairment of the qualities peculiar to the race or kind, or to a type; reduction to a lower type in some scale of being.

The hypothesis of Degeneration will, I believe, be found to render most valuable service in pointing out the true relationships of animals which are a puzzle and a mystery when we use only and exclusively the hypothesis of Balance, or the hypothesis of Elaboration.

E. R. Lankester, Degeneration, p. 30.

And now to inquire briefly what is meant by degeneration. It means literally an unkindling, the undoing of a kind, and in this sense was first used to express the change of kind without regard to whether the change was to perfect or to degrade, but it is now used exclusively to denote a change from a higher to a lower kind: that is to say, from a more complex to a less complex organization; it is a process of dissolution, the opposite of that process of involution which is pre-essential to evolution.

Huxley, Body and Will, p. 240.

Specifically—2. Loss or impairment of natural or proper qualities; descent to an inferior state; the act of becoming or the state of having become inferior, especially with respect to moral qualities.—3. In physiol., any process by which a tissue or substance becomes replaced by some other regarded as less highly organized, less complex in composition, of inferior physiological rank, or less suited for the performance of its original functions. Quaisa, Med. Dict., p. 334.

Degeneration may be defined as a gradual change of the structure in which the organism becomes adapted to less varied and less complex conditions of life.

E. R. Lankester, Degeneration, p. 32.

4. A degenerate animal or plant; an organism of a degraded type. [Rare.]

Those grains which generally arise among corn, as cockle, arcaus, erglopa, and other degenerations,
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 17.

Albuminoid degeneration, albuminous degeneration. Same as lardaceous degeneration.—Amyloid degeneration. See lardaceous disease, under lardaceous.—Calcareous degeneration, a morbid disturbance in the nutrition of a tissue, resulting in the deposition in it of salts of lime.—Cancerous degeneration, cancerous degeneration. See cancer.—Colloid degeneration. See colloid.—Fatty degeneration, in physiol. the conversion of protein elements into a granular fatty matter. As a morbid process, this occurs most frequently in the muscles of the heart, in the walls of capillaries, and in the urinary tubules; but it may affect any part of the body.—Fibroid degeneration, the conversion of a tissue into one of fibrous structure, or the substitution of a form of connective tissue for some other tissue.—Granular degeneration. Same as cloudy swelling (which see, under cloudy).—Hypothesis of degeneration, the hypothesis that certain organisms manifesting an inferior grade of structural and physiological characteristics are the degenerate descendants of higher forms. The theory makes the degeneration chiefly the result of disease of parts; thus, the octopuses are descendants from quadrupeds, and have assumed the fish-like form and lost their hind limbs in better accommodating themselves to aquatic life, the small-winged and flightless birds are descendants from those with well-developed wings, which, on account of residence in places where they were not much disturbed, have failed to exercise their wings, and finally lost the use of them, and they have aborted; the intestinal worms without an intestine are descendants from those with an intestine, but on account of their environments the skin has assumed the function of a nutrient medium and the intestine has been lost.—Lardaceous degeneration. Same as lardaceous disease (which see, under lardaceous).—Mucoid degeneration, the conversion of cells or intercellular substance into a semifluid translucent substance containing much.—Paraneurymatous degeneration. Same as cloudy swelling (which see, under cloudy).—Pigmentary degeneration, disturbance of the nutrition of a part, with deposition of pigment.—Wallerian degeneration, the degeneration of nerve-fibers which have been separated, as by section of a nerve, from certain ganglia which exercise a nutritive influence on them.

degenerationist (dē-jen'g-rā'shən-ist), n. and a. [**degeneration* + -ist.] 1. n. One who advocates the theory of degeneration; one who believes that the general tendency of organized beings, especially of man in his mental and moral life, is to degenerate; one who maintains that the natural course of civilization is downward rather than upward.

With regard to the opinions of older writers on early civilization, whether progressionists or degenerationists, it must be borne in mind that the evidence at their disposal fell far short of even the miserably imperfect data now accessible.

E. R. Tylor, Prim. Culture, l. 48.

II. a. Pertaining to the theory of degeneration.

The two works of Sir John Lubbock and Mr. Tylor, respectively, appear to us to agree as to the main issues of which they treat, both authors being like opponents of the doctrines which Mr. Tylor has styled degenerationist.
London (London).

degenerative (dē-jen'g-rā-tiv), a. [**degenerare* + -ive.] Tending to degenerate; of the nature of degeneration.

We were able to note some slight degenerative process in the gray substance. Tr. in Aliment. and Neurol., VIII. 196.

degenered (dē-jen'g-rād), a. [Aocsm. form of degenerate, with (E.) -ed = (L.) -atus. Cf. degender, v.] Degenerate.

Yet of religion a degender seed Industrious nature in each heart had sown.
Sitting, Domesday, The Fifth Hour.

degenerescence (dē-jen'g-rēs'gns), n. Same as degeneration.

degenerisist (dē-jen'g-ris), v. t. [As degenerous + -ist.] To degenerate; become degenerated.

Degenerisist, derelict, and withered knight.
Sylvestre, tr. of Du Barres's Weeks, II, The Vocation.

degenerous (dē-jen'g-rus), a. [**OF. degenerous*, degenerous, with added suffix (E.) -ous, < L. degener, ignoble, degenerated: see degender, v.] Degenerate.

I am thy handy-work, thy creature, Lord,
Stamp'd with thy glorious image, and at first
Most like to thee, though now a poor accurst, Convicted califf and degenerous creature.
Quarles, Emblems, III. 10.

degenerously (dē-jen'g-rus-lī), adv. In a degenerate manner; basely; meanly.

How wounding a spectacle is it to see our greatest heroes, like Hercules at the distaff, thus degenerously employed!

Decey of Christian Prety.

degerminator (dē-jēr'mi-nā-tor), n. [NL., < L. de + germen (germin), germ. Cf. F. dégermer, extract the germ.] In milling, a machine consisting essentially of two corrugated disks of iron, one fixed and the other revolving, between which wheat is passed to split the grains and extract the germs.

degest, a. [Appar. < L. digestus, pp. of digere, arrange, dispose, digest: see digest.] Grave; composed. Jamieson.

Furth held the stout and degest Auletes.
Gavin Douglas, Virgil, p. 221.

degestly, adv. [**degest* + -ly.] Gravely; composedly; deliberately. Jamieson.

Agit Alethes, that na wyndome wantit,
But bairn was ripe in counsels and in yeris,
Unto thir wordis degestly maid answer.
Gavin Douglas, Virgil, p. 224.

degger (deg'gēr), n. One who degs or sprinkles.

degging-machine (deg'gīng-mā-shēn'), n. [**degging*, verbal n. of deg, sprinkle, < machine.] A sprinkling-machine used in calendering cotton.

deglise, v. and n. See deguise.

deglase (dē-glā's), v. t.; pret. and pp. deglased, ppr. deglasing. [**de* + priv. + glase.] To remove the glaze from.

deglory (dē-glō'ri), v. t.; pret. and pp. degloried, ppr. deglorying. [**de* + priv. + glory. Cf. disglory, n.] To disgrace; dishonor.

His head
That was before with degloried.
G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph.

deglube (dē-glōb'), v. t. [**L. deglubere*, peel off, < de, off, < glube, peel.] To skin; peel.

Now enter his taxing and deglubing face.
Cleveland, Poems (1851). (E. D.)

Deglubitores (dē-glō-bi-tō'rēs), n. pl. [NL., < L. deglube, peel off: see deglube.] In Macgillivray's system of classification, the third order of birds; the hawks or coraciiform birds. It included the falcons and buntings, the tansagers, and the American blackbirds, and was therefore equivalent to the families now recognized as Fringillidae, Tanagridae, and Icteridae. See Kuher. [Not in use.]

deglutinate (dē-glō'ti-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. deglutinated, ppr. deglutinating. [**L. deglutinus*, pp. of deglutire (> F. deglutir), unglue, < de + priv. + glutinare, glue, < gluten, glue: see gluten, glue.] 1. To unglue; loosen or separate by or as if by ungluing.

See, see, my Boole (ah, hark! how it doth crack!)
The Hand of Outrage that deglutinates
His Vesture, glu'd with gore-blood to his back.

Davies, Holy Roods, p. 14.

2. To deprive of gluten; extract the gluten from.

deglutition (deg-lō'tish'gən), n. [= F. deglutition = Pg. deglutición = It. deglutizione (cf. Sp. deglución), < LL. **deglutitio* (n.), < deglutire, swallow down, < de, down, < glutire, swallow: see glut.] The act or power of swallowing.

The tongue serves not only for feeding, but also to assist the mastication of the meat and deglutition.
Ray, Works of Creation, II.

Muscles of deglutition, those muscles which are employed in the act of swallowing; the muscles of the tongue, palate, and pharynx.

deglutitious (deg-lō'tish'us), a. Pertaining to deglutition. [Rare.]

deglutitive (dē-glō'ti-tiv), a. [As deglutitio + -ive.] Pertaining to deglutition; concerned in the act of swallowing; deglutitious; deglutitory.

deglutitory (dē-glō'ti-tō-ri), a. [As deglutitio + -ory.] Serving for deglutition.

deglycerin (dē-glīs'g-rin), v. t. [**de* + priv. + glycerin.] To free from glycerin.

The French process, so largely adopted in America, for deglycerating neutral fats before they are saponified.
W. L. Carpenter, Soap and Candles, p. 181.

degorder (deg'ōr-dēr), n. [Irreg. < deg (see) + order.] The pair of numbers signifying the degree and order of any mathematical form.

degote (dē-gōt'), n. [Russ. degot, birch-tar.] Oil of birch, obtained from the white birch by a process of dry distillation. It is used to give to Russian leather its peculiar odor, and to perfume imitations of it. Also called elackert. Less correctly written degut, degut.

degouted, a. [So. degoutit, < OF. degouté, deguité, spotted (cf. degouter, degoutier, drop, drop down), < L. de + guttatus, spotted, < gutta, a drop, spot: see guttate.] Spotted.

A mantill
Degoutit with the self in spotted black.
King's Quair, v. 10.

degradation (deg-rā-dā'shən), n. [= F. dégradation = Pr. degradacion = Sp. degradacion = Pg. degradação = It. degradazione = D. degradatie = G. Dan. Sw. degradation, < ML. degradatio (n.), a reducing in rank, < degradare: see degrade.] 1. A reducing in rank; the act of depriving one of a degree of honor, of dignity, or of rank; deposition, removal, or dismissal from rank or office: as, the degradation of a general.

Specifically—(a) In eccl. law, the act of depriving an ecclesiastic of his orders or privileges, or of both. The Roman Catholic Church recognizes two methods of degradation. By the simple or verbal degradation the accused is deprived of all his orders and benefices. By the solemn or real degradation he is with great ceremony stripped of his ecclesiastical vestments and ornaments and publicly reproached by the bishop, deprived of his orders and benefices as in simple degradation, and of his various privileges. He remains, however, a priest, and can in special emergencies consecrate and administer the sacraments. Degradation is now resorted to only in extreme cases. In the early church the culprit was degraded by removal from a higher to a lower grade of office. See deposition, 4. (b) The act of depriving a person of his degree in a university. (c) In early American colleges, when the students' names were arranged according to the social rank of the parents, the placing of a name, as a punishment, lower than it would otherwise be placed. B. H. Hall. (d) In the University of Cambridge, England, the postponement of a student's candidacy for a degree, etc., for one year, owing to illness or other unavoidable cause. (e) In the University of Oxford, the solemn cancelling in convocation of the degree held by a member of the university. 2. The state of being reduced from a higher to a lower grade of power, character, or estimation; degeneracy; debasement.

Deplorable is the degradation of our nature. South.

The descent of Spain, once the first among monarchies, to the lower depths of degradation, the elevation of Holland, in spite of many natural disadvantages, to a position such as no commonwealth has ever reached, teach the same lesson [the tendency of Papal domination].

Manning.

3. The act of sinking to a lower level in space. [Rare.]

Lycius has sunk on one knee and with closed eyes is about to slip prone. Lamia leans over and supports his head from further degradation, while her left hand comforts his shoulder.
The Century, XXXI. 248.

4. Diminution or reduction, as of strength, value, altitude, or magnitude.—5. In painting, a lessening and obscuring of distant objects in a landscape, to give the effect of distance.—6. In geol., the reduction or wearing down of higher lands, rocks, strata, etc., by the action of water or other causes.

They [Scottish geologists] appealed to the vast quantity of sedimentary rocks . . . bearing witness in every bed and layer to the degradation and removal of former continents.
Gillie, Geol. Sketches, II. 33.

7. In biol., abortive structural development; retrograde metamorphosis, such as that witnessed in many parasites as a result of their parasitism.

The degradation of the species man is observed in some of his varieties. Dorn.

The course of development may, in particular cases, lead to numerous retrogradations, so that we may find the adult animal to be of lower organization than the larva. This phenomenon, which is known as retrogressive metamorphosis, corresponds to the demands of the selection theory, since under more simple conditions of life, where asceticism is more easily obtained (parasitism), degradation and even the loss of parts may be of advantage to the organism.

Cress, Biology (trans.), 1. 158.

8. In bot., a change consisting of abstraction, loss, abortion, or non-development of usual organs.—9. In her., same as abatement.—Degradation of energy. See energy.—Syn. 1 and 2. Debatement, abatement, violation, depression, disgrace, dishonor, humiliation.

degradational (deg-rî-dâ'shon-pl), a. [< degradation + -al.] In nat. hist., due to degradation; lowered in type through degradation; degenerated: as, a degradational form; degradational structures.

degrade (dê-grâd'), v.; pret. and pp. degraded, ppr. degrading. [< ME. degraden, < OF. degrader, F. dégrader = Pr. degradar, degradar = Sp. Pg. degradar = It. degradare = D. degradieren = G. degradiren = Dan. degradere = Sw. degradera, < ML. degradare, reduce in rank, deprive of rank, < L. de, down, + gradus, step, degree, rank; see grade and degree.] 1. trans. 1. To reduce from a higher to a lower rank, degree, or type. Specifically—2. To deprive of any office or dignity; strip of honors: as, to degrade a general officer.

When you disgrac'd me in my ambassade,
Then I degraded you from being king.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iv. 3.

Both which have been degraded in the senate,
And must have their disgraces still new rubbed
To make them smart, and labour of revenge.
B. Jonson, Catiline, l. 1.

Fryne was sentenced by the Star Chamber court to be degraded from the bar.
Fairfax.

8. To lower in character; cause to deteriorate; lessen the value or worth of; debase: as, drunkenness degrades a man to the level of a beast.

Nor shalt thou, by descending to assume Man's nature, lessen or degrade thine own.
Milton, P. L., iii. 304.

Shall we lose our privilege, our charter,
And wilfully degrade ourselves of reason
And piety, to live like beasts?
Shirley, Love's Cruelty, II. 2.

In the progress of moral truth, the animal passions which degrade our nature are by degrees checked and subdued.
Sumner, Orations, I. 174.

4. In biol.: (a) To reduce in taxonomic rank; lower in the scale of classification: as, to degrade an order to the rank of a family. (b) To reduce in complexity of structure or function; simplify morphologically or physiologically: as, an organism degraded by parasitic habit.

The degree to which many of the most important organs in these degraded (cleistogamic) flowers have been reduced, or even wholly obliterated, is one of their most remarkable peculiarities, reminding us of many parasitic animals.
Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 330.

5. In geol., to reduce in altitude or magnitude, as hills and mountains or icebergs; wear down, as by the weather.

Although the ridge is still there, the ridge itself has been degraded.
Journal of Science.

The regions within reach of abrading and degrading agencies were therefore of sufficient extent for the needed Paleozoic sediment-making.
Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXIX. 228.

6. In optics, to lower in position in the spectrum; increase the wave-length of (a ray of light), and hence diminish (its) refrangibility, as by the action of a fluorescent substance. See fluorescence.—7. To diminish the strength, purity, also, etc., of.

Degrading the brilliancy of dyed stuffs, or the purity of whites.
Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 330.

—Syn. 1 and 2. Debase, Degradate, etc. (see above); to dishonor, break, cashier, reduce to inferior rank.—3. To lower, sink, impair, injure, pervert, pollute. See list under debase.

II. *trans. 1. In nat. hist., to degenerate in type; pass from a higher type of structure to a lower.—2. To degenerate; become lower in character; deteriorate.

No doubt vast eddies in the flood
Of onward time shall yet be made,
And thronged races may degrade.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxviii.

8. In a university, to take, for some particular reason, a lower degree than one is entitled to, or to avoid taking a degree at the proper or usual time; descend from a higher to a lower degree.

Degrading, or going back a year, is not allowed, except in cases of illness (proved by a doctor's certificate). A man degrading for any other reason cannot go out afterwards in Honors. C. A. Bristol, English University, p. 126, note.

degraded (dê-grâd'), p. a. 1. Reduced in rank; deprived of an office or a dignity.—2. Lowered in character or value; debased; low.

The Netherlands . . . were reduced practically to a very degraded position.
Medley.

8. In biol., reduced in taxonomic rank, or in complexity of structure or function; brought to or being in a state of degradation.

Skulls of the very meanest and most degraded type.
Ferris, Language, iv.

The Protosoa are the most degraded in organization.
Science, IV. 172.

4. In her., placed upon steps. Also degraded.—Cress degraded and contained. See class.

degradement (dê-grâd'ment), n. [< OF. degradation, F. dégradement (= It. degradamento), < degrader, degrade; see degrade.] Deprivation of rank or office. [Rare.]

So the words of Ridley at his degradement, and his letter to Hooper, expressly show.
Milton, Reformation in Eng., II.

degrading (dê-grâd'ing), p. a. 1. Dishonoring; debasing; disgraceful: as, degrading obsequiousness.

The inordinate love of money and of fame are base and degrading passions.
Wirt.

2. Lowering; bringing to a lower level; wearing down.—Degrading causes, in geol., those causes which contribute to the dissolving and wearing down of the elevated parts of the earth's surface, and the carrying of these parts down into lower levels, as atmospheric influences and the action of rivers and of the ocean.

degradingly (dê-grâd'ing-ly), adv. In a degrading manner, or in a way to depreciate.

This is what Bishop Taylor degradingly calls virtue and precise duty.

degras (de-grâ'), n. [F.] Wool-grease.

degraver (dê-grâ-vât'), v. t. [< L. degradare, make heavy, weigh down, < de, down, + gradus, heavy; see grade.] To make heavy; burden.
Bailey, 1727.

degravation (deg-rî-vâ'shon), n. [*< L. as if *degravatio(n)-, < degradare, make heavy, weigh down; see degrade.*] The act of making heavy.

degrease (dê-grês'), v. t.; pret. and pp. degreased, ppr. degreasing. [< de-priv. + grease, after F. dégraisser.] To remove the grease from, as from bones in preparing skeletons, or from feathers or hair in preparing skins. [Rare.] degree (dê-grê'), n. [< ME. degre, degree, < OF. degre, degret, F. degré = Pr. degré = Pg. grado, a degree, step, rank, < L. de, down, + gradus, a step, etc.; see grade and gradus.] Cf. degrade. 1. A step, as of a stair; a stair, or set of steps.

Round was the shap, in manere of compass,
Full of degrees, the heighte of sixty paces,
That when a man was set on o' degre,
He lette nought his fellewe for to see.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1083.

It is made with Stages and hath Degrees aboute, that every Man may wel see, and none greve other.
Manderly, Travels, p. 17.

But when he once attaine the utmost round,
He then unto the ladder turns his back,
Looks in the clouds, scorning the base degrees
By which he did ascend.
Shak., J. C., II. 1.

2. A step or single movement toward an end; one of a series of advances; a stage of progress; a phase of development, transformation, or progressive modification.

We have feet to scale and climb
By slow degrees, by more and more,
The cloudy summits of our time.
Longfellow, Ladder of St. Augustine.

Specifically—3. In gram., one of the three stages, namely, positive, comparative, and superlative, in the comparison of an adjective or an adverb. See comparison, 5.—4. The point of advancement reached; relative position attained; grade; rank; station; order; quality.

Thence the kerver or server most deserve every dish in his degree.
Beech Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 262.

He shold scrche, fro degre into degre, Vn-to know wherens he descendyd is,
Duke, Erie, or Baron, or markos if he be.
Rom. of Parthenay (E. E. T. S.), Int., l. 112.

Great indeed
His name, and high was his degree in heaven.
Milton, P. L., v. 707.

5. In universities and colleges, an academical rank conferred by a diploma, originally giving the right to teach. The earliest degree was that of master, which in the university of Bologna, and others modeled on that (as were the faculties of law in all the old universities), was called the degree of doctor. Afterward the lower degree of determinant (later called bachelor) was introduced, and the intermediate degree of licentiate; but these were not regular degrees, except in the faculty of arts. The degree of bachelor was conferred by the "nation" of the faculty of arts; the others were given by the chancellor, by authority of the pope. Thus, the medieval degrees were: (1) the degree of determinant, or bachelor of arts, without a diploma; (2) the license; (3) the degree of master of arts; (4) the degree of master or doctor of theology; (5) the degree of master or doctor of medicine; (6) the degree of doctor of laws. The degrees now usually conferred are bachelor, master, and doctor: as, bachelor of arts, divinity, music, or law; master of arts; doctor of divinity, law, medicine, philosophy, music, etc.

He [Wolsey] was born at Ipswich in Suffolk, the Son of a Butcher, sent to Oxford by Reason of his Pregnancy of Wit, so soon, that taking there the first Degree of Art, he was called the Boy Butcher.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 261.

The Universities ceased to teach the systematic theology of the Schools, and the systematic jurisprudence of the Decretals; and the ancient degrees of bachelor and doctor of the canon law are known, except during the reign of Mary, no more.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 519.

6. In geneal., a certain distance or remove in the line of descent, determining the proximity of blood: as, a relation in the third or fourth degree. See first extract, and forbidden degrees, below.

In the canon law, degrees of relationship is reckoned by the number of steps from the person farthest from the common ancestor to him; in the civil law, by the number of steps from one person up to the common ancestor and down to the other. Thus, a grand-uncle is related to his grand-nephew in the third degree by the canon law, in the fourth degree by the civil.

She was as familiar as a cousin; but as a distant one—a cousin who had been brought up to observe degrees.
H. James, Jr., Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 242.

7. In alg., the rank of an equation, as determined by the highest power under which an unknown quantity appears in it. Thus, if the exponent of the highest power of the unknown quantity be 3 or 4, the equation is of the third or fourth degree.

8. One of a number of subdivisions of something extended in space or time. Specifically—(a) One of a number of equal subdivisions on the scale of a meteorological or other instrument, as a thermometer. (b) A unit for measuring circular arcs and the angles subtended by them at their centers, being the 360th part of a circumference, or the 90th part of a right angle. Considered as angular magnitudes, all degrees are equal; considered as lengths of arcs, they are directly proportional to the radii of the circles of which they are parts. This manner of dividing the circle originated with the Babylonians about 3000 B. C., and was brought into use in Greece by the mathematician Hypsicles. It was perhaps in its origin connected with an opinion that the year consisted of 360 days. The common abbreviation or sign for "degrees" is a small circle (°) placed to the right of the top of the last figure of the number of them: as, 45°. The degree is subdivided into 60 minutes, and the minute into 60 seconds. The length of a degree of latitude is the length of an arc of the section of the figure of the sea-level by a meridian, the difference of latitude between the extremities of this arc being one degree. (See latitude.) It is 69.703 statute miles at the equator, and 69.160 at the poles. The length of a degree of longitude is the length of an arc of the section of the figure of the sea-level by a plane parallel to the equator, the difference of longitude between the extremities of this arc being one degree. This is nearly proportional to the cosine of the latitude, and is equal to 69.16 statute miles at the equator.

After the Auteurs of Astronomy, 700 Furlonges of Erthe answered to a Degree of the Firmament.

(c) In arith., three figures taken together in numeration: thus, the number 270,320 consists of two degrees (more commonly called periods). (d) In music. (1) One of the lines or spaces of the staff, upon which notes are placed. Notes on the same degree, when affected by accidentals, may denote different tones, as D, D♯, and D♭; and, similarly, notes on different degrees, as D♯ and C♯, may denote identical tones, at least upon instruments of fixed intonation. (2) The difference or step between a line and the adjacent space on the staff (or vice versa). Occasionally, through the use of accidentals, this difference is only apparent (see above). (3) The difference, interval, or step between any tone of the scale and the tone next above or below it, as from do to re, from re to fa. The interval may be a whole step or tone, a half step or semitone, or (in the minor scale) a step and a half, or augmented tone. See step, tone, interval, staff, scale. [To distinguish between degrees of the staff and degrees of the scale, the terms staff-degrees and scale-degrees are sometimes used.]

9. Intensive quantity; the proportion in which any quality is possessed; measure; extent; grade.

goure larnes sall likom othir wedde,
And worshippe god in gud degree.
York Plays, p. 55.

But as there are degrees of sinning, so there are of folly in it.
Stillington, Sermons, I. II.

Very different excellencies and degrees of perfection.
Clarke, The Attributes, viii.

The difference in mind between man and the higher animals, great as it is, is certainly one of degree and not of kind.
Darwin, Descent of Man, I. 101.

10. In criminal law: (a) One of certain distinctions in the culpability of the different participants in a crime. The actual perpetrator is said to be a principal in the first degree, and one who is present aiding and abetting, a principal in the second degree. (b) One of the phases of the same kind of crime, differing in gravity and in punishment. [U. S.]—Accumulation of degrees. See accumulation.—By degrees, step by step; gradually; by little and little; by moderate advances.

Th' innumerable effects to sort aright,
And, by degrees, from chaos to elixir.
Sir J. Davies, Immortal, of Soul, xxx.
Where light, to shades descending, plays, not strives,
Dies by degrees, and by degrees revives.
Dryden, Epistles, xiv. 70.

By due degrees, small Doubts create.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

Chronicle degree, one 360th part of a tropical year. — Conjunct degree. See conjunct. — Degree out. See cut. — Degree of a curve, the same as its order, but the latter term is preferable. — Degree of constraint. See constraint. — Degree of freedom. See freedom. — Discrete degrees. See discrete. — Forbidden or prohibited degrees, in civil and in canon law, degrees of consanguinity and affinity within which marriage is not allowed. The determination of these in church or canon law was founded on the prohibitions contained in Lev. xviii., with adherence to the principle that a degree of relationship which bars marriage in one sex bars it equally in the other, and that by Christ's declaration (Mat. xix. 6 and Mark x. 8, confirming Gen. ii. 24) a man and his wife become one flesh. The Roman law prohibited nearly the same degrees, though marriage of a man with his niece was permitted from the time of Claudius until forbidden by Nerva, and also from the time of Caracalla to that of Constantine. Marriages with a deceased brother's wife and a deceased wife's sister were forbidden by Constantine. Theodosius the Great forbade them between first cousins, and this was the general rule of the church from that time on. From the sixth to the thirteenth century, marriages within the seventh degree were prohibited; after the fourth Lateran Council (A. D. 1215), only those within the fourth degree. Marriage between godparents and godchildren was prohibited by Justinian, and this was afterward extended to include the parents of the children, and later still other relations of these. The present for confirmation was put on a par with the godparents. The Council of Trent limited such spiritual relationship to sponsors, to presenters at confirmation, to the persons baptized or confirmed, and the parents of these. In England marriage between first cousins was forbidden till the Reformation. The present English law of both church and state is conformed to a statute passed under Henry VIII., and revised under Elizabeth, which forbids all marriages not without the Levitical degrees. These degrees were tabulated by Archbishop Parker in 1563, and his table is adopted in the 90th canon of 1603, and ordered to be set up publicly in every church. It will also be found printed at the end of every English prayer-book. Its provisions have been summarized as follows: A man may not marry the mother or stepmother of his own or his wife's parents; the widow of his father, father-in-law, uncle, brother, son, stepson, or nephew; the aunt, sister, daughter, or niece of himself or his wife; the daughter or stepdaughter of his own or his wife's children. A woman may not marry the father or stepfather of her own or her husband's parents; the widower of her mother, mother-in-law, aunt, sister, daughter, stepdaughter, or niece; the uncle, brother, son, or nephew of herself or her husband; the son or stepson of her own or her husband's children. Marriage with a deceased wife's sister, whether expressly forbidden by the Mosaic law or not, is prohibited as precisely analogous to that with a deceased husband's brother, the marriage of a man with his brother's wife being explicitly prohibited in Lev. xviii. Direct relationship, if in the ascending and descending line, is canonically reckoned as one degree, and marriage prohibited accordingly. In canon law an illicit connection is held to involve the same prohibitions as a marriage. — In degree, greatly; to a degree.

He was grieved in degree.

And greatly moved in mynde.

Local degree, one 360th part of the solid. — Simoon's degree, a certain early medieval degree, conjectured to have been one of bachelor, and to have been conferred upon masters in the University of Oxford. The real meaning of the phrase has been forgotten; but down to 1327 every master of arts, inceptor in medicine, etc., in Oxford was compelled to swear hatred of Simoon and renunciation of his degree. — Song of degrees, a title given to fifteen psalms, from cxx. to cxxv., inclusive. Biblical criticism are not agreed as to the origin and significance of the title. See gradual psalms, under gradual. — To a degree, to an extreme; exceedingly; as, prudent to a degree. [Colloq.]

Assuredly, sir, your father is worth to a degree; he comes down stairs eight or ten steps at a time—muttering, growling, and thumping the banisters all the way.

Sheridan, The Rivals, II. 1.

Total degree, the sum of the degrees of an algebraic expression relatively to the different letters.

degree (dē-grē'), v. t. [degree, n.] 1. To advance by a step or steps.

Thus is the soul's death degraded up. Sin gathers strength by custom, and creeps like some contagious disease in the body from joint to joint. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 230.

I will degrade this noxious neutrality one peg higher.

Sp. Hacti, Alp. Williams, II. 138.

2. To place in a position or rank.

We that are degraded above our people.

degum (dē-gum'), v. t.; pret. and pp. degummed, ppr. degumming. [de-priv. + gum.] To free from gum; deglutinate.

Scouring renders all common silks, whether white or yellow in the raw, a brilliant pearly white, with a delicate soft flossy texture, from the fact that the fibres which were agglutinated in reeling, being now degummed, are separated from each other and show their individual tenacity in the yarn. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 62.

degust (dē-gust'), v. [L. degustare, taste of, de- + gustare, taste; see gust.] I. trans. To taste; relish.

A soups au vin, madam, I will degust, and gratefully.

C. Roads, Cloister and Hearth, II.

II. intrans. To have a taste; be relishing.

Two or three, all fervent, hushing their talk, degusting tenderly, and storing reminiscences—for a bottle of good wine, like a good act, shines over in the retrospect.

degustate (dē-gus'tāt'), v. t. [L. degustatus, pp. of degustare, taste of; see degust.] Same as degust.

degustation (dē-gus-tā'shən), n. [= Sp. degustacion, < L. degustatio(n), < L. degustare, taste of; see degust.] The act of tasting.

It is no otherwise even in carnal delights, the degustation whereof is wont to draw on the heart to a more eager appetite.

Sp. Hall, Soul's Farewell to Earth, § 9.

Then he bustled about with the boy, and produced a variety of gifts for grace, use, and degustation.

N. Betham-Edwards, Next of Kin Wanted, xxiv.

Good wine is not an optical pleasure, it is an inward emotion; and if there was a chamber of degustation on the premises, I failed to discover it.

H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 129.

degysse, v. and n. See deguise.

déhaché (dē-ha-shé'), a. [F. (in her), pp. of OF. déhacher, déhachier, cut off, < de-priv. + hacher, cut; see hack, hach.] In her, having the head, paws, and tuft of the tail cut off; said of a beast used as a bearing. Encyc. Brit., XI. 698.

déhiscé (dē-his'), v. i.; pret. and pp. déhiscéd, ppr. déhiscing. [= It. deiscere, < L. dehiscere, gape, open, < de, off, + hiscere, gape, yawn, akin to haur, yawn; see hiatus and yawn.] To gape; specifically, in bot., to open, as the capsules of plants.

This [a legume or pod] is a superior, one-celled, one- or many-seeded fruit, déhiscing by both ventral and dorsal sutures, so as to form two valves.

R. Bentley, Manual of Botany, p. 304.

The anthers déhiscéd properly, but the pollen-grains adhered in a mass to them.

Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 232.

déhiscence (dē-his'ens), n. [= F. déhiscence = It. deiscenza, < NL. déhiscētia, < L. dehiscētia, déhiscēnt; see déhiscēnt.] 1. A gaping. — 2. In bot., the opening of a pericarp for the discharge of the seeds, or of an anther to set free the pollen. Regular déhiscence in the case of capsules is septifid, through the septa, or loculifid, directly into the cells. It is also said to be septifragul when the valves break away from the septa. Irregular déhiscence may be transverse, circumscissile, etc., or variously lacerated. The déhiscence of an anther is by longitudinal slits, valves, pores, etc.

The déhiscence of the firm external envelope.

deiparous (dē-ip'ā-rus), a. [< L. deipara, fem. adj., < L. deus, a god, + parere, bear, bring forth.] Bearing or bringing forth a god: an epithet applied to the Virgin Mary. Bailey.

Deipnosophist (dē-nos'f-ist), n. [< Gr. deipnosophia, sing. of deipnosophia, Deipnosophists, the name of a work of Athenus (see the def.), lit. 'the learned men at dinner,' < deipnos, dinner, + sophia, a learned man: see sophist.] One who converses learnedly at dinner: in allusion to the title (see the etymology) of a celebrated work of Athenus, in which a number of learned men are represented as at dinner discoursing on literature and matters of the table.

The eye is the only note-book of the true poet; but a patchwork of second-hand memories is a laborious scribble, hard to unite and harder to read, with about as much nature in it as a dialogue of the Deipnosophists.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 222.

deirrhine, n. [Ir.] See poirrhine.

deist, n. A Middle English form of deus.

deism (dē-izm), n. [< F. deisme = Sp. Pg. It. deismo = D. G. deismus = Dan. deisme = Sw. deism, < NL. deismus, < L. deus, God, + -ismus, E. -ism.] 1. The doctrine that God is distinct and separated from the world. See deist, 1. — 2. Belief in the existence of a personal God, accompanied with the denial of revelation and of the authority of the Christian church. Deism is opposed to atheism, or the denial of any God; to pantheism, which denies or ignores the personality of God; to theism, which believes not only in a God, but in his living relations with his creatures; and to Christianity, which adds a belief in a historical manifestation of God, as recorded in the Bible.

deist (dē-ist), n. [< F. deiste (Viret, 1568), now deiste = Sp. Pg. It. deista = D. G. Dan. Sw. deist, < NL. deista, < L. deus, God, + -ista, E. -ist.] 1. One who believes in the existence of a personal God, but in few or none of the more special doctrines of the Christian religion; one who holds to some of the more general propositions of the Christian faith concerning the Deity, but denies revelation and the authority of the church. The name in this sense is particularly appropriated to a group of English writers, mostly of the first half of the eighteenth century. See free-thinker.

A man who, on the account of the obscurity of Holy Writ, shall pretend to reject the christian religion, and turn deist, must, upon the same account, reject deism too, and turn atheist.

2. One who holds the opinion that there is a God, but no divine providence governing the affairs of men; one who holds that God is not only distinct from the world, but also separated from it.

Those who admit a transcendental theology are called Deists, those who admit a natural theology Theists. The former admit that we may know the existence of an original being by mere reason, but that our concepts of it transcendental only, as of a being which possesses all reality, but a reality that cannot be further determined. The latter maintain that reason is capable of determining that object more accurately in analogy with nature: namely, as a being which, through understanding and freedom, contains within itself the original ground of all other things.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Muller.

— Syn. Atheist, Spontic, etc. See infidel.
deistic (dē-is'tik), a. [< deist + -ic.] Pertaining to deism or to deists; of the nature of deism; embracing or containing deism: as, a deistic writer; a deistic book.

deistical (dē-is'ti-kəl), a. Same as deistic.

This very doctrine [that man is by nature wicked] . . . has made the deistical moralists almost unanimous in proclaiming the divinity of Nature, and setting up its fancied dictates as an authoritative rule of action.

N. A. Rev., CXX. 422.

deistically (dē-is'ti-kəl-i), adv. In a deistic manner.

deisticalness (dē-is'ti-kal-ness), n. The character of being deistical; deism. [Rare.]
deistate (dē-i-tāt), a. [Irreg. < L. deista (t)-e, deity, + -ate.] Possessing the nature of God; divine; deified.

One person and one Christ who is God incarnate, and man deitate, as Gregory Nazianzen saith, without mutation.
Cressmer, To Bp. Gardiner

Deiters's cells. See cell.

deity (dē-i-ti), n.; pl. deities (-tiz). [*ME. deite, deyte, < OF. deite, Fr. deité = Pr. deitat = Sp. deidad = Pg. deidade = It. deità, < L. deita (t)-e (for classical L. divinitas (t)-e, divinity), the divine nature, < L. deus (> F. dieu = Pr. deus, deus = Sp. dios = Pg. deos = It. dio), a god, God. The L. deus (whence also E. deity, deify, deism, deist, and prob. deuce, q. v.) is one of a large group of words whose forms and etymological and mythological relations are somewhat involved. The principal L. words of the group are: (1) L. deus, earlier divus (pl. di, di, dat. and abl. pl. diu, diu, in inscriptions also divus, divus, gen. pl. divom, divum; later nom. pl. dei, gen. pl. deorum), orig. "divus, "divus, a god; cf. Skt. deva, heavenly, as n. a god, = Zend deva, an evil spirit, = Lith. deva, a god; Gael. and Ir. da, God, = OW. diu, W. duw, God, = Iscl. dev, a god; prob. not connected with Gr. deûs, a god (whence E. theism, theist, atheism, atheist, thearchy, theodicy, theology, etc.). (2) L. divus, often divus (= Gr. divos or divos, divine), adj. to deus; hence L. divinus, divine (see divine); cf. Skt. divya, divine, divya, heavenly; L. divus, divus, adj., as n. a god. (3) OL. Διότις, later Jovis (nom. rare; gen. Jovis, etc.), Jove, Jupiter (see Jove, Jupiter). = Gr. Ζεύς, Beotian Διεύς, for Διεύς (gen. Διός for Διός), Zeus (see Zeus), = Skt. dyāus (gen. dyāus, stem dyā-), the sky, heaven, day, personified Heaven; the same in combination, OL. Ζωπύτης, L. Jupiter, Juppiter, in another form Diapiter, = Gr. voc. Ζῆν πάτερ = Skt. voc. Dyāush pitāh, lit. Heaven Father; = OTeut. **Tiw*, in OHG. Zio = AS. Tiwe = Iscl. Týr, the Teutonic god of battle; the AS. Tiw is still preserved in E. Tuesday, AH. Tues day (see Tue and Tuesday). (4) L. diēs, a day, orig. "diēs, "diēs; cf. Skt. dyāus (stem dyā-), day (the same as dyāus, the sky, etc., above), Armenian tiw, Ir. diā = W. dyw, day; see diā, diurnal, journal, journey. (5), etc.: For other L. deity-names from the same root, see Diana, Janus, Juno, and Ius. Cf. also demon.] 1. Godhead; divinity; the attributes of a god; especially, the nature and essence of the one Supreme Being.*

For what reason could the same deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora which was given to Venus? Ralegh.

So spake the Father: and, unfolding bright Toward the right hand his glory, on the Son Blazed forth unclouded day. Milton, P. L., x. 66.

2. [cop.] God; the Supreme Being, or infinite self-existing Spirit: regularly with the definite article.

An Atheist's laugh's a poor exchange For Deity offended!
Burns, Epistle to a Young Friend

I seem . . . to see the benevolence of the Deity more clearly in the pleasures of my young children than in anything else in the world. Paley, Moral Philos., ii. 5.

3. A god; a divinity; a being to whom a divine or godlike nature is attributed; an object or a person worshipped as a god.

Even Buddha himself is not worshipped as a deity, or as a still existent agent of benevolence and power. He is merely revered as a glorified remembrance.
Sir J. E. Tennant, Ceylon, iv. 11.

deject (dē-jekt'), v. t. [= OF. dejector, dejecter, dejecter, F. déjecter = Pr. dejectar, < L. dejectus, pp. of deicere, deicere, cast down, < de, down, + jacere, cast, throw: see jet, and cf. abject, adject, conject, eject, etc.] 1. To cast or throw down; direct downward.

In nothing water hem deject
 So lette hem nothing longe tyme swete.

Ere long she was able, though in strength exceedingly dejected, to call home her wandering senses.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

3. To depress the spirits of; dispirit; discourage; dishearten: now chiefly in the past participle used adjectively. See dejected.

In the midst of all my endeavours, there is but one thought that dejects me.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 2.

Nor think to die dejects my lofty mind.
Pope, R. of the L., v. 99.

-Syn. 2. To sadden, make despondent, afflict, grieve.
deject (dē-jekt'), a. [OF. deject = Sp. dejecto = It. dejecto, < L. dejectus, pp.: see the verb.] Downcast; low-spirited; wretched; dejected.

And I, of ladies must deject and wretched,
 That suck'd the honey of his music vows,
 Now see that noble and most sovereign reason,
 Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 1.

dejecta (dē-jek'tā), n. pl. [L., neut. pl. of dejectus, pp. of deicere, deicere, thrown down: see deject.] Excerements.

deliverable (dē-liv'ér-ə-bl), a. [ME. deliver<sup>1</sup> + -able.] That may be or is to be delivered.

deliverance (dē-liv'ér-əns), n. [ME. deliverance, delivorence, < OF. delivorence (F. delivrance = Pr. delivrance = Sp. delivrance (obs.) = It. deliverance), < delivore, deliver; see deliver<sup>1</sup> + -ance.] 1. The act of setting free; release or rescue, as from captivity, oppression, danger, or evil of any kind.

In his standeth all your deliverance, Or elles your death without doubt.

Rom. of Parthey (K. T. S.), l. 1868.

God sent me . . . to save your lives by a great deliverance.

He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives.

Luke iv. 18.

2. Acquittal of a prisoner by the verdict of a jury.—3. Parturition; childbirth; delivery.

In the labour of women it helpeth to the easy deliverance.

Becon.

Hence—4. The act of disburdening of anything; especially, the act of disburdening the mind by uttering one's thoughts.

Assume that you are saying precisely that which all think, and in the flow of wit and love roll out your paradoxes in solid column, with not the infirmity of a doubt. So at least shall you get an adequate deliverance.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 217.

5. The act of giving or transferring from one to another.—6. Utterance; declaration; also, a particular statement, especially of opinion; specifically, an authoritative or official utterance by speech or writing; a decision in a controversy.

You have it from his own deliverance.

Shak., All's Well, ii. 5.

To be of any use in the controversy, then, the immediate deliverance of my consciousness must be competent to assure me of the non-existence of something which by hypothesis is not in my consciousness.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 162.

Indeed, so innocent and persistent have been the deliverances of their lordships upon the subject, that it might almost seem as though a bishop would have considered himself lacking in duty if he had omitted any opportunity of sounding the note of alarm.

Brit. Quarterly Rev., LXXXIII. 33.

7. In Scots law, the expressed decision of a judge or an arbitrator, interim or final. When interim, it is technically called an interlocutor. deliverer (dē-liv'ér-er), n. [ME. deliverer; < delivore + -er.] 1. One who delivers, rescues, or sets free; a savior or preserver.

The Lord raised up a deliverer to the children of Israel.

Judges iii. 9.

2. One who delivers by transferring or handing over: as, a deliverer of parcels or letters.—3. One who declares or communicates.

Truly, speaking of the law of nature, with that threat God himself was inventor, . . . deliverer, discover, discoverer.

Recher., Recher., Polity, viii. § 460.

delivorence (dē-liv'ér-əns), n. [ME. delivorence.] A female deliverer. [Rare.]

Joan d'Arc, . . . the delivorence of the towns from our country men when they besieged it.

Shelton, Memoirs, April 21, 1844.

deliverer (dē-liv'ér-er), adv. [ME. deliverer, delivore; < delivore + -er.] Nimble; cleverly; jauntily; actively. [Obsolete or archaic.]

When Gaheris laugh his brother Gawain, he lepte upon his feet, and sette on his heed his battle deliverer, and hente a-gein his sward, and apparelled hym to defende.

Morte (K. T. S.), ii. 192.

Where be your ribbands, maids? swim with your bodies, And carry it sweetly and deliverer.

Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, iii. 6.

Every time we say a thing in conversation, we get a mechanical advantage in detaching it well and deliverer.

Emerson, Clubs.

delivorence (dē-liv'ér-əns), n. [ME. delivorence, -ness; < delivore + -ness.] Agility; nimbleness; speed. Chaucer.

This, for his delivorence and swiftnesse, was surnamed Horofote.

Fabryen, Chron., l. cecil.

delivery (dē-liv'ér-ē), n.; pl. deliveries (-is). [ME. deliver<sup>1</sup> + -y, after heavy.] 1. The act of setting free; the act of freeing from bondage, danger, or evil of any kind; release; rescue; deliverance.

He . . . swore, with sobe,

That he would labour my delivery.

Shak., Rich. III., l. 4.

In the delivery of them that surin, no mans particular carefulness asued one person, but the meere goodnesse of God himselfe.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, II. 70.

2. A giving or passing from one to another; the act of transferring or handing over to another: as, the delivery of goods or of a deed; the delivery of a parcel or a letter.—3. Surrender; a giving up.

The delivery of your royal father's person into the hands of the army.

Sir J. Denham.

4. In law, the placing of one person in legal possession of a thing by another.—5. Aid given in the act of parturition; the bringing forth of offspring; childbirth.—6. Utterance; enunciation; manner of speaking or singing.

I was charmed with the gracefulness of his figure and delivery.

Addison.

7. The act of sending or putting forth; emission; discharge: as, the delivery of the ball in base-ball, cricket, etc.; the delivery of fire or of a charge in battle; the delivery of a blow from the shoulder.—8. Capacity for pouring out or disburdening of contents: as, the delivery of a pipe.—9. Free motion or use of the limbs; activity; agility.

The duke had the neater limbs, and freer delivery.

Sir H. Wotton.

10. In foundry, allowance or free play given to a pattern so that it can be readily lifted from the mold. Also called draw-taper.—Actual delivery, or delivery in fact, in law, a transfer of physical possession.—Constructive delivery, in law, such a change in the situation as in legal effect is a transfer of possession.—Delivery of juridical possession, in law, a term used in parts of the United States acquired from Mexico to denote the formal transfer of the possession of land required by Mexican law, which was necessary to the complete investiture of title; corresponding to the common-law livery of seisin. Under Mexican administration it was performed by a magistrate of the vicinage, and it included the establishment of boundaries when they were uncertain. The purchaser, in the presence of the magistrate and witnesses, pulled up grass and stones and threw them to the four winds of heaven, in token of his legal and legitimate possession. The magistrate made a record of these proceedings, duly attested by the witnesses, and gave a copy to the new owner.—Delivery-roller, in mach., the last of a series of rollers, or that which finally carries the object from the operative parts of the machine.—Delivery-valve, the valve through which a pumped fluid is discharged.—General delivery, the delivery of mail from the delivery-window of a post-office upon application of the persons to whom it is addressed.—Good delivery, in the law of sales, and particularly in the stock exchange, a delivery or tender by the seller proper to fulfil his obligation.—Jail delivery. See paid-delivery.—Symbolical delivery, in law, the delivery of property by handing over something else as a symbol, token, or representative of it, as, for instance, the key of the warehouse containing it.—W. & A. Merrett, Delivery. See election.

del<sup>1</sup> (del), n. [ME. del<sup>1</sup> = MD. delle, D. del, a dale, vale, = G. dial. delle, a hollow; a deriv. (as dim.) of ME. dal, dale, E. dale: see dale.] For the relation of forms, cf. tell, tail.] A small valley between hills; a little dale; a glen; a ravine.

That break (in the forest) is a del: a deep, hollow cup lined with turf.

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xii.

In a little del among the trees there is a small ruined mosque.

E. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 54.

del<sup>2</sup> (del), n. [Origin obscure.] A young girl; a wench.

[Thievish cant.]

My del and my dainty wild del.

Midleton and Dalton, Boaring Girl, v. 1.

Della Crusca (del'ə krus'ka). [It. della, of the (< L. de, of, + illa, that); crusca, bran.] The name of an academy founded at Florence in 1582, mainly for promoting the purity of the Italian language. Its emblem was a stove, and its name referred to its purpose of sifting out the bran or refuse from the language. After a short period of incorporation in the Florentine Academy, it was revived in the early part of the nineteenth century.

Della-Cruscan (del'ə krus'kan), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to, characteristic of, or resembling the Academy della Crusca or its methods. The epithet Della-Cruscan was applied to a school of English poetry started by certain Englishmen at Florence toward the end of the eighteenth century, whose sentimentalities and affectations found many imitators in England. Against it the satire of Gifford's "Baviad" (1794) was directed.

The pent-up imagination, which here and there had trickled off in Della-Cruscan dilettantism.

Quarterly Rev., CLXIII. 68.

II. n. A member of the Academy della Crusca, or of the English school of poetry named after it.

Della Robbia ware. See ware.

delocalize (dē-lō'kal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. delocalized, pp. delocalizing. [de- priv. + local-ize.] To free from the limitations of locality; widen the scope or interests of.

We can have no St. Simons or Poyennes till we have a Paris or London to delocalize our gossip and give it historic breadth.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 82.

The principle of representation was constantly delocalizing the town, and bringing into the arena subjects which reminded men of their relationship to the state and the crown.

H. E. Souder, Noah Webster, p. 20.

deloo (dē-lō'), n. [N. African.] A kind of North African duikerbok, Cephalophorus griseus, one of the pygmy antelopes. It is about 3 feet long, of a fawn color with whitish flanks, black ankles, and a black stripe on the face running up to the tuft of hair on the poll.

deloul, n. See delul. Lagard.

Deloyala (dē-lō'ya-lā), n. [NL., < Gr. dēlos, clear, + yalos, glass.] A genus of tortoise-beetles: a synonym of Cryptocycla. The name was used by Chevrolat in Dejean's catalogue without diagnosis. An American species, Deloyala or Cryptocycla clausa, is 7.6 millimeters long, very broadly oval, pale, testaceous, and has the elytra brown, tuberculate, and gibbous, with a large hyaline spot in the middle of the side margin and a similar small subapical spot, whence the name. It feeds on potato-vines.

Clabbed Tortoise-beetle (Deloyala clausa) (Line drawn natural size.)

delph, n. An improper spelling of delphi.

Delphacida (del-fas'ī-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Delphax (-ao-) + -ida.] A group of hemipterous insects, typified by the genus Delphax, regarded as one of the numerous subfamilies of Fulgoroidea, or referred to the Cixiidae.

Delphax (del'faks), n. [NL., < Gr. dēlphax, a young pig.] A genus of phytophagous hemipterous insects, or plant-lice. D. saccharivora is a West Indian species very injurious to the sugar-cane.

Delphian (del'fā-n), a. and n. [Delphi + -an.]

I. a. 1. Relating to Delphi, a town of ancient Greece, on Mount Parnassus in Phocis, or to the sanctuary of Apollo at that place, the most celebrated fane of Greek worship.

The Delphian vales, the Palestines, The Meccas of the mind.

Hallock.

2. Of or pertaining to Apollo (as Apollo Delphinus, of Delphi), or to his priestesses (the Pythoness) of the oracle of Delphi, who under inspiration delivered the responses of the oracle; hence, inspired.

An inward Delphian look.

Lowell, Among my Books, 3d ser., p. 222.

Also Delphiman.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of Delphi.

The Delphians contributed a fourth, and collected everywhere for it. C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 80.

2. With the definite article, Apollo.

Delphic (del'fik), a. [L. Delphicus, < Gr. dēlphik, pertaining to dēlphoi, Delphi.] Same as Delphian.

For still with Delphic emphasis she spann'd

The quick invisible strings.

delphin<sup>1</sup> (del'fin), n. [ME. delphin, delfin, < L. delphinus, ML. also delphus, < Gr. dēlphic, later also dēlphic, a dolphin (Delphinus delphis). Hence delphis and delphin, q. v.] A dolphin.

Thar both oft yake delphines, & so-calles, & balones (grēt fisch, as hyt were of whaler's kinde).

Froben, tr. of Higden's Polychronicon, i. 41.

delphin<sup>2</sup> (del'fin), a. [L. delphinus, also delphis, a dolphin (in ML. applied to the eldest son of the king of France: see dauphin): see delphin<sup>1</sup>, n., and delphia.] 1. In soöl., pertaining to a dolphin, or to the Delphinida.—2. Pertaining or relating to the Dauphin of France.

Also delphinus, delphinian.
Delphin editions of the classics, a set of Latin classics prepared by thirty-nine scholars under the superintendence of Montanier, Boissier, and Huet, for the use of the dauphin (ad. v. 1685), son of Louis XIV. They are not now valued except for their indexes of words.

delphin<sup>2</sup> (del'fin), n. [For delphinus (which is in use in another chem. sense), < Delphinus + -in<sup>2</sup>.] A neutral fat found in the oil of several members of the genus Delphinus.

Delphinapterinae (del-fī-nap'te-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Delphinapterus + -inae.] A subfamily of Delphinidae, containing the beluga or white whale (Delphinapterus) and the narwhal (Monodon), as together contrasted with other delphinoids collectively. They have the cervical vertebrae all distinct, and not more than 6 phalanges in any digit.

Delphinapterus (del-fī-nap'te-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. delphs, delphs, dolphin, + apteros, wingless (taken as 'finless,' with ref. to the absence of a dorsal fin), < ap- priv. + pteron, a wing, a fin: see apterous.] 1. A genus of delphinoid odontocete cetaceans, typical of the subfamily Del-

Beluga, or White Whale (Delphinapterus leucas).

phinapterinae, containing the beluga or white whale (D. leucas). It is related to Monodon, and resembles the narwhal except in dentition. It has 32 to 40 teeth; 50 vertebrae, the cervical vertebrae being 11 ribs; short, broad, and rounded fins; a low ridge in place of a dorsal fin; the head rounded; and the snout very slightly projecting, if at all. The species attains a length of 12 feet, is white, and chiefly inhabits arctic seas. Beluga is a synonym.

2. A genus of dolphins (Delphinidae) which have no dorsal fin, as D. peronii; now called Leucorhamphus. See Delphinus, 1.

delphinate (del'fī-nāt), n. [delphin + -ate<sup>1</sup>.] A salt formed by the union of delphinic acid with a base.

delphine, a. See delphin<sup>1</sup>.

Delphinia (del-fī-nī-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl., < Gr. delphina, an epithet of Apollo, taken as 'of Delphi' (< delphos, Delphi), but in form < delphs, delphs, a dolphin: see dolphin, Delphia.] A festival of Apollo Delphinus (the Dolphin or protector of navigation, the god of Delphi), of expiatory character, celebrated at Athens and Argina, and generally among Ionian colonies along the Mediterranean coasts. At Athens it was held on the 6th of Mounychion (end of March), toward the close of the period of winter storms at sea, and included a procession in which seven boys and seven maidens bore olive-branches, bound with fillets of white wool, to the Delphinian temple near the temple of the Olympian Zeus.

delphinia (del-fī-nī-ā), n. Same as delphinidae.

Delphinian (del-fī-nī-an), a. 1. Same as Delphinian. Compare Pythian.—2. [i. e.] Same as delphin<sup>1</sup>.

delphinic (del-fī-nīk), a. [i. e. delphinus, dolphin: see dolphin<sup>1</sup>.] Noting an acid discovered by Chevreul first in dolphin-oil and afterward in the ripe berries of the Guelder-rose. It is now known to be identical with valeric acid.

Delphinidae (del-fī-nī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Delphinus + -idae.] A large family of odontocete cetaceans. By recent authors it has been limited to those having normally numerous teeth in both jaws; a short symphysis of the mandible, not exceeding one third the length of the jaw; no distinct lacrymal bones; the pterygoids short, scroll-like, and inviolated; the capitular articulations of the ribs disappearing backward; the costal cartilages ossified; and the blow-hole median, transversely crescentic, and coarsely fissured. In size and shape the Delphinidae vary greatly. With few exceptions they are marine. As above described, the family includes all the marine cetaceans known as dolphins, porpoises, grampuses, etc., as well as the caaling, or pilot-whales, belugas or white whales, and the narwhal. It has been divided into Pontoporiinae, Delphinapterinae, Delphininae, and Globicephalinae.

Delphininae (del-fī-nī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Delphinus + -inae.] The typical subfamily of Delphinidae, containing the dolphins and porpoises proper, together with the killers, as distinguished from the belugas, narwhals, black-shah, etc. They have no cervical constriction, the post-axial cervical vertebrae are more or less consolidated, and the second and third digits have from 5 to 9 phalanges. See cuts under dolphin and porpoise.

delphinine<sup>1</sup> (del'fī-nīn), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Delphininae.

II. n. A species of Delphininae.

discovered in the plant Delphinium Staphenagria. Its taste is bitter and acrid. When heated it melts, but on cooling it becomes hard and brittle like resin. Applied externally, its effects are analogous to those of veratrine, and it has been used as a substitute for it in the treatment of neuralgia. Also delphinia, delphia, delphinida, delphia.

Delphinium (del-fī-nī-um), n. [NL., < Gr. delphion, larkspur (so called from the form of the neotary, which resembles the ordinary representations of the dolphin), < delphs, delphs, a dolphin: see dolphin.] An extensive genus of the natural order Ranunculaceae, consisting of annual or perennial herbaceous plants, with usually blue, purple, or white flowers. The flowers are in loose racemes, and are very irregular, consisting of five colored sepals and only two conspicuous petals, the spurs of which are enclosed in the long spur of the upper sepal. There are 50 species or more, scattered over the northern temperate zone, 30 of which are found in the United States. Two species peculiar to California have red or yellowish flowers. Many are cultivated in gardens under the name of larkspur, chiefly D. ajacis and D. consolida of Europe, and D. elatum from Siberia, with numerous hybrids. One species, the D. Staphenagria, commonly called stavesacre, yields the vegetable alkaloid delphinine.

Flower of Larkspur (Delphinium Staphenagria), cut longitudinally.

delphinoid (del'fī-nōid), a. and n. 1. [i. e. delphinoideus, like a dolphin, < delphs, delphs, a dolphin, + eidos, form.] 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Delphinidae or Delphinoidae; like or likened to a dolphin.

II. n. One of the Delphinidae or Delphinoidae; a dolphin, porpoise, or any other living toothed cetacean not a caelalote.

Delphinoidae (del-fī-nōid-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Delphinus + -oidae. See delphinoid.] A superfamily group of odontocete cetaceans, containing all the living toothed whales, porpoises, dolphins, etc., excepting the sperm-whales or caelalotes. The families are the Iniidae, Platanistidae, Delphinidae, and Siphiidae. The association is made entirely on cranial characters.

delphinoidine (del-fī-nōid-in), n. [delphinus + -oid + -ine<sup>2</sup>.] An amorphous alkaloid obtained from the seeds of Delphinium Staphenagria.

Delphinula (del-fī-nū-lā), n. [NL., dim. of L. delphinus, a dolphin; so called on account of an imagined likeness to the conventional dolphin.] A genus of gastropods, typical of the family Delphinulidae.

Delphinulidae (del-fī-nū-lī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Delphinula + -idae.] A family of rhypidoglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Delphinula.

delphinula. They are destitute of cephalic lobes, but have cariniform appendages to the foot, and otherwise the animals resemble those of the families Turbinidae and Trochidae. The shell is turbinate or discoidal and has a circular aperture. The operculum is multispiral and corneous, but sometimes provided with a thin calcareous layer. The living species are inhabitants of tropical seas. Numerous extinct forms have been referred to the family.

delphinuloid (del-fī-nū-lōid), a. [delphinula + -oid<sup>1</sup>.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Delphinulidae; like a member of the genus Delphinula.

Delphinus (del-fī-nus), n. [L., a dolphin: see dolphin<sup>1</sup> and dolphin.] 1. The typical genus of the family Delphinidae, to which very different limits have been assigned. (a) By the authors of the Linnean school it was used for all the cetaceans with teeth in both jaws, and consequently for the Delphinidae (except Monodon), Platanistidae, and Iniidae. (b) By later authors it was restricted to Delphinidae, but included at first all except those of the genera Phocaena and Delphinapterus; gradually others were excluded. (c) By recent authors it is restricted to species of Delphinidae whose chief peculiarity is in the deep longitudinal grooves on the sides of the palate, separating the alveolar border from the median ridge. They have numerous (more than 80) small pointed teeth, close set along each jaw; from 50 to 90 vertebrae; the rostral part of the skull longer than the cranial portion, whence the head has a pointed snout marked off from the forehead by a groove; the dorsal fin large, triangular or falcate, sometimes wanting; and the flippers of moderate size, narrow, pointed, and falcate, with the lateral digits small or rudimentary. As thus defined, the genus contains the animals to which the word dolphin should be restricted, as the original dolphin of the ancients, Delphinus delphis, but which are commonly called porpoises by confounding them with the species of Phocaena, sometimes called cuttle-neck or bay porpoise. The burro, D. burrus, is a larger and bulkier species. A dry dolphin marked with white, and living from 30 to 50 years, constitutes a group to which the name Lagenorhynchus is applied. A Chinese species, with only about 30 vertebrae, is called Steno cinctus. A species from the south seas, D. peronii, without a dorsal fin, has been called Leucorhamphus and Delphinapterus. See cut under dolphin.

2. One of the ancient constellations, representing a dolphin. It is situated east of Aquila.

delphinine (del'fī-nīn), n. An alkaloid obtained from the seeds of Delphinium Staphenagria. It appears in crystalline tufts.

Delsartian (del-sart'i-an), a. 'Of or pertaining to François Delsarte (1811-1871), a French musician, or to the method of developing bodily grace and strength founded by him.

delta (del'tā), n. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. F. Sp. Pg. It., etc., delta, < L. delta, < Gr. deltā, the name of the 4th letter, also anything so shaped, esp. a triangular island formed by the mouths of large rivers, as of the Nile, Indus, etc.; < Heb. daleth, the 4th letter of the alphabet, lit. a door: see D.] 1. The name of the Greek letter Δ, answering to the Latin and English D. See D.—2. A triangular island or alluvial tract included between the diverging branches of the mouth of a great river: as, the delta of the Nile, of the Ganges, of the Mississippi, etc.—3. In anat., a triangular space or surface.—Delta fornicis, in anat., the delta of the fornicis; the triangular entocuticular area of the inferoposterior surface of the fornicis, constituting the roof of the aulla. In the cat its base coincides with a line between the pores, and its two other sides are ripe, or the lines of reflection of the endyma upon the intruded aliplexus. Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 477.—Delta mesencephali, in anat., the delta of the mesencephali; the triangular area at the root of the spine of the scapula, at the vertebral end of the mesencephali. Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 165.

deltacation (del'tā-kā-shn), n. [delta + -cation, ult. < L. facere, make: see -fy.] The process of forming a delta at the mouth of a river.

deltale (del-tā'ik), a. [delta + -ale.] 1. Pertaining to or like a delta.
The lignit is formed by the three most westerly of the ganges spill-streams of the Ganges.
Nineteenth Century, XXIII. 43.

2. Having or forming a delta.

It [Bharatpur] now discloses the last stage in the decay of a deltale river.
Nineteenth Century, XXIII. 43.

delta-metal (del'tā-met'pl), n. [delta, a triangular figure (in allusion to the three constituent metals), + metal.] An alloy of copper and zinc with a small percentage of iron, recently introduced and put to use in England and Germany. It resembles Aich metal and stero-metal (see these words), the principal difference being that in the manufacture of delta-metal improvements have been made by means of which a fixed percentage of iron can be introduced, which was not the case with the other alloys mentioned, whence these never came into general use. Delta-metal is said to be as strong as mild steel, and to have the great advantage of not rusting. A small steamer has been constructed of this alloy for navigating the rivers of Central Africa. It is said, also, that it has been introduced as a material for rolls in powder-mills because not liable to give rise to sparks as steel rollers do, and that it is coming into use for many other purposes where strength is desired, and where the facility with which steel rusts makes its employment undesirable.

deltidium (del-tid'i-um), n.; pl. deltidia (-j). [NL., dim. of Gr. deltā, the letter Δ: see delta.] In soöl., the triangular space between the beak and the hinge of brachiopod shells. It is usually covered in by a shelly plate.

deltoid (del'tōid), a. and n. [= F. deltoides = Sp. deltóide = Pg. It. deltóide, < NL. deltóides, < Gr. deltroideus, delta-shaped, < deltā, delta (Δ), + eidos, form.] 1. a. Resembling the Greek letter Δ; triangular.

A visit to the shore showed its mouth to be deltoid in character, three mouths being noticed, and probably more existing.
Science, III. 705.

Specifically—(a) In anat.: (1) Forming a triangular plate or part; being triangular: as, the deltoid muscle. (2) Relating to the deltoid muscle: as, the deltoid crest of the humerus. (b) In bot., pertaining to or resembling the pyramidal moth, or Deltoides. (c) In bot., triangular or broad-shaped: as, a deltoid leaf; also applied to the cross-section of a leaf, etc.—Deltoid moth, a popular name given to various species of the pyralid family Pyralidae, which in reverse spread their wings over the back in the form of a triangle.

2. Having or forming a delta.

Specifically—(a) In anat.: (1) Forming a triangular plate or part; being triangular: as, the deltoid muscle. (2) Relating to the deltoid muscle: as, the deltoid crest of the humerus. delubrum (dē-lū'brum), n.; pl. delubra (-brā). [L., a temple, shrine, sanctuary, prob. so called as the place of expiation; the lit. sense is more obvious in ML. delubrum, a baptismal font; < L. deluere, wash off, cleanse, < de, away, + luere, wash.] 1. In Rom. antiq., a temple or sanctuary, by some scholars believed to have contained a basin or fountain in which persons coming to sacrifice washed. But the actual distinction between delubrum and templum is uncertain.—2. In eccles. arch., a church furnished with a font.—3. A font or baptismal basin.

deludable (dē-lū'da-bl), a. [< delude + -able.] Susceptible of being deluded or deceived; liable to be imposed upon or misled.

For well understanding the omniscience of his nature, he is not so ready to deceive himself as to falsify unto him whose cognition is in no way deludable.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 2.

delude (dē-lūd'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deluded, ppr. deluding. [< ME. deluden, < OF. deluder, also deluer, < L. deludere, pp. delusus, mock, make sport of, deceive, < de + ludere, play, jest. Cf. allude, collude, illude.] 1. To deceive; impose upon; mislead the mind or judgment of; beguile; cheat.

Shouldst thou deluded feed

On hopes so groundless, thou art mad indeed

Crabbe, Works, IV, 102.

Peterborough wrote two letters to the governor, one of which he contrived to have intercepted by the Spanish general, with the result of deluding him into the belief that he was surrounded by a large army.

Quarterly Rev., CXIV, 120.

2t. To frustrate or disappoint; elude; evade.

They which during life and health are never destitute of ways to delude repentance, do notwithstanding oftentimes, when their last hour draweth on, . . . feel that stinging which before lay dead in them.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vi. 4.

Whate'er his arts be, wife, I will have thee

Delude them with a trick, thy obstinate silence.

B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, i. 2.

—Syn. 1. Mislead, Delude (see mislead); to cozen, dupe, lead astray.

deluder (dē-lū'dēr), n. One who deceives or beguiles; an impostor; one who holds out false pretenses.

And thus the sweet deluders tune their song.

Pope.

deluge (del'j), n. [< ME. deluge, < OF. deluge, deluere, F. deluge = Fr. diluvi = Sp. Pg. It. diluvio, < L. diluvium, a flood, < diluere, wash away, < de, dis-, away, + luere, wash. Cf. diluvial.] 1. Any overflowing of water; an inundation; a flood; specifically, the great flood or overflowing of the earth (called the universal deluge) which, according to the account in Genesis, occurred in the days of Noah, or any of the similar floods found in the traditions of most ancient peoples, accompanied by a nearly total destruction of life. See flood.

The apostle doth plainly intimate that the old world was subject to perih by a deluge, as this is subject to perih by conflagration. T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. Anything analogous to an inundation; anything that overwhelms or floods.

A fiery deluge fed

With ever-burning sulphur unconsumed.

Milton, P. L., l. 62.

Saw Babylon set wide her two-ear'd brass

To let the military deluge pass.

Comper, Expectation.

After the deluge (F. après moi le déluge, a saying ascribed to Louis XV., who expressed thus his indifference to the results of his policy of selfish and reckless extravagance, and perhaps his apprehension of coming disaster.

deluge (del'j), v.; pret. and pp. deluged, ppr. deluging. [< deluge, n.] 1. Trans. 1. To pour over in a deluge; overwhelm with a flood; overflow; inundate; drown.

Still the battering waves rush in,

Implacable, till, delug'd by the foam,

The ship sinks, foundering in the vast abyss.

Philips.

Lands deluged by unbridled floods.

Wordsworth, The Browne's Cell.

2. To overrun like a flood; pour over in overwhelming numbers: as, the northern nations deluged the Roman empire with their armies.

—3. To overwhelm; cause to sink under the weight of a general or spreading calamity.

At length corruption, like a general flood,

Shall deluge all.

Pope, Moral Essays, iii. 137.

II. *intrans. To suffer a deluge; be deluged. [Rare.]

I'd weep the world to such a strain,

That it should deluge once again.

Marquis of Montrose, Death of Charles I.

delul (de-lū'), n. [Ar.] A female dromedary. Also written delou.

Begunins bestriding naked-backed Deluls, and clinging like apes to the hairy hump.

delusion (dē-lū'shun), n. [= OF. delusion = Sp. delusion = Pg. delusão = It. delusione, < L. delusio (-n-), < deludere, delude: see delude.] 1. The act of deluding; a misleading of the mind; deception.

For God hath justly given the nations up

To thy delusions.

Milton, P. L., l. 442.

The major's good judgment—that is, if a man may be said to have good judgment who is under the influence of love's delusion.

Thackeray, Vanity Fair.

2. The state of being deluded; false impression or belief; error or mistake, especially of a fixed nature: as, his delusion was unconquerable. See the synonyms below.

God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie.

2 Thea. ii. 11.

Some angry power cheats with rare delusions

My credulous sense.

Ford, Lover's Melancholy, iv. 3.

I, waking, view'd with grief the rising sun,

And fondly mourn'd the dear delusion gone. Prior.

Of all the delusions against which history and historical geography have to strive, there is none more deeply rooted than the notion that there has always been a land called Switzerland and a people called the Swiss.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 222.

—Syn. 2. Illusion, Delusion, Hallucination. As now technically used, especially by the best authorities in medical jurisprudence, delusion signifies a false mental appearance or conception produced by an external cause acting through the senses, the falsity of which is capable of detection by the subject of it by examination or reasoning. Thus, a mirage, or the momentary belief that a reflection in a mirror is a real object, is an illusion. A delusion is a fixed false mental conception, occasioned by an external object acting upon the senses, but not capable of correction or removal by examination or reasoning. Thus, a fixed belief that an inanimate object is a living person, that all one's friends are conspiring against one, that all food offered is poisoned, and the like, are delusions. A hallucination is a false conception occasioned by internal conditions without external cause or aid of the senses, such as imagining that one hears an external voice when there is no sound to suggest such an idea. If a person walking at twilight, seeing a post, should believe it to be a spy pursuing him, and should imagine he saw it move, this would be an illusion, a continuous belief that every person one sees is a spy pursuing one, if such as cannot be removed by evidence, is a delusion, a belief that one sees such spies pursuing, when there is no object in sight capable of suggesting such a thought, is a hallucination. Illusions are not necessarily indications of insanity, delusions and hallucinations, if fixed, are. In literary and popular use an illusion is an unreal appearance presented in any way to the bodily or the mental vision; it is often pleasing, harmless, or even useful. The word delusion expresses strongly the mental condition of the person who puts too great faith in an illusion or any other error he "labors under a delusion." A delusion is a mental error or deception, and may have regard to things actually existing, as well as to illusions. Delusions are ordinarily repulsive and discreditable, and may even be mischievous. We speak of the illusions of fancy, hope, youth, and the like, but of the delusions of a fanatic or a lunatic. A hallucination is the product of an imagination disordered, perhaps beyond the bounds of sanity; a flighty or crazy notion or belief, generally of some degree of permanence; a special aberration of belief as to some specific point: the central suggestion in the word is that of the groundlessness of the belief or opinion.

Poetry produces an illusion on the eye of the mind, as a magic lantern produces an illusion on the eye of the body.

Mackenay, Milton.

Dreams or illusions, call them what you will,

They lift us from the commonplace of life

To better things.

Longfellow, Michael Angelo.

The people never give up their liberties but under some delusion. Burke, Speech at County Meeting in Bucks, 1784.

Those other words of delusion and folly, Liberty first and Union afterward.

D. Webster, Reply to Hayne.

Mankind would be subject to fewer delusions than they are, if they constantly bore in mind their liability to false judgments due to unusual combinations, either artificial or natural, of true sensations.

Husley and Youmans, Physiol., § 222.

A few hallucinations about a subject to which the greatest clerks have been generally such strangers may warrant us to dissent from his opinion.

Boyle.

delusional (dē-lū'shun-al), a. [< delusion + -al.] 1. Pertaining to, characterized by, or of the nature of delusion.

The hitherto recognized delusional insanities.

Allen and Neurol., VIII, 644.

2. Afflicted with delusions: as, the delusional insane.

In a third case a systematized delusional lunatic had delusions of persecution.

Allen and Neurol., IV, 422.

delusionist (dē-lū'shun-ist), n. [< delusion + -ist.] One who causes or is a subject of delusion; a deluding or deluded person.

The principles of evidence that have heretofore commanded the world's acceptance make no distinction in the quality or quantity of testimony for different varieties of claims. . . . Under this feature of current logic delusionists of all kinds have consistently and persistently found refuge.

Pope Sci. M., XIII, 322.

delusive (dē-lū'siv), a. [= Sp. delusivo, < L. as if **delusivus*, < delusus, pp. of deludere, delude: see delude.] 1. Apt to delude; causing delusion; deceptive; beguiling: as, delusive arts; delusive appearances.

Stretched on the earth, with fine delusive sleights,

Mocking a gaping crew.

B. Jonson, Volpone, i. 1.

That fond, delusive, happy, transient spell,

That hides us from a world wherein we dwell

Crabbe, Works, VII, 202.

2. Of the nature of a delusion; unreal; imaginary. [Rare.]

There is no such thing as a fictitious, or delusive, sensation. A sensation must exist to be a sensation, and if it exists, it is real and not delusive.

Husley and Youmans, Physiol., § 270.

—Syn. 1. See falsitious and deceptive.

delusively (dē-lū'siv-ly), adv. In a delusive manner; so as to delude.

I. D'Israeli, Amén. of Lit., I. 279.

demagnetization (dë-mag'net-i-zä'shün), n. [demagnetize + -ation.] 1. The act or process of depriving of magnetic polarity.—2. In mesmerism, the act of restoring a person in the mesmeric trance to a normal state of consciousness; demesmerization.

Also spelled demagnetisation.

demagnetize (dë-mag'net-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. demagnetized, ppr. demagnetizing. [depriv. + magnetize.] 1. To deprive of magnetic polarity.

A thunder-storm demagnetized the compass of his Britannic majesty's ship Wren, in which I was then a midshipman.

W. C. Russell, Jack's Courtship, xxix.

The induction of a magnet on itself always tends to diminish the magnetization, and acts like a demagnetizing force.

Atkinson, tr. of Mascart and Joubert, I. 282.

2. To demesmerize; restore from a mesmerized state to normal consciousness.

Also spelled demagnetise.

demagogic, demagogical (dem-a-goj'ik, -i-käl), a. [= F. demagogique = Sp. demagógico = Pg. demagógico (cf. D. G. demagogisch = Dan. Sw. demagogisk), < Gr. δημαγωγία, of or fit for a demagogue, < δημαγωγός, a demagogue; see demagogue.] Relating to or like a demagogue; given to pandering to the rabble from self-interest.

Demagogic leaders from South Germany stumped the province and stirred up the people. Lowie, Hamack, I. 262.

demagogism, demagogism (dem-a-gog-izm), n. [demagogue + -ism.] The practices and principles of a demagogue; a pandering to the multitude for selfish ends.

There has been nothing of Cleon, still less of Strepsiades striving to underbid him in demagogues, to be found in the public utterances of Mr. Lincoln.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 179.

demagogue (dem-a-gog), n. [F. demagogue = Sp. Pg. It. demagogo = D. demagog = G. Dan. Sw. demagog = Russ. demagog, < NL. demagogus, < Gr. δημαγωγός, a leader of the people, < δημος, the people, the populace, + αγωγός, a leader, < αγω, lead; see agent, act.] 1. Historically, a leader of the people; a person who sways the people by oratory or persuasion.

Demosthenes and Cicero, though each of them a leader, or, as the Greeks called it, a demagogue, in a popular state, yet seem to differ in their practice.

Swift.

All the popular jealousies and alarms at regal authority would have been excited by demagogues in the senate as well as in the comitia; for there are in all nations aristocratical demagogues as well as democratical.

J. Adams, Works, IV. 584.

2. An unprincipled popular orator or leader; one who endeavors to curry favor with the people or some particular portion of them by pandering to their prejudices or wishes, or by playing on their ignorance or passions; specifically, an unprincipled political agitator; one who seeks to obtain political power or the furtherance of some sinister purpose by pandering to the ignorance or prejudice of the populace.

A plausible insignificant word, in the mouth of an expert demagogue, is a dangerous and deceitful weapon.

South, Works, II. ix.

To lessen the hopes of usurping demagogues, we must enlighten, animate, and combine the spirit of freemen.

Ames, Works, II. 273.

The doctrine of State rights can be so handled by an adroit demagogue as easily to confound the distinction between liberty and lawlessness in the minds of ignorant persons.

The soldiers likewise *demand*ed of him, saying, And what shall we do?

Luke III. 14.

demand (dë-mänd'), n. [ME. demando, demando, < OF. demande, F. demande = Pr. Sp. Pg. demando = It. dimanda, a demand; from the verb.] 1. An asking for or a claim made by virtue of a right or supposed right to the thing sought; an authoritative claim; an exaction: as, the *demand*s of one's creditors.

He will give you audience: and wherein

It shall appear that your *demand*s are just.

You shall enjoy them. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 1.

He that has the confidence to turn his wishes into *demand*s will be but a little way from thinking he ought to obtain them.

Locke.

2. An insistent asking or requisition; exaction without reference to right: as, the *demand*s of a blackmailer.—3. That which is demanded or required; something claimed, exacted, or necessary: as, what are your *demand*s upon the estate? the *demand*s upon one's time; the *demand*s of nature.

The sufferings of the poor are not caused by their having little as compared with the rich; but by their having little as compared with the simplest *demand*s of human nature.

W. H. Mallach, Social Equality, p. 202.

4. The state of being in request or sought after; requisition; call.

In 1678 came forth a second edition [of the "Pilgrim's Progress"] with additions; and then the demand became immense.

Massey, John Bunyan.

Specifically—5. In polit. econ., the desire to purchase and possess, coupled with the power of purchasing; sometimes technically called effective demand: as, the supply exceeds the demand; there is no demand for pig-iron.

Adam Smith, who introduced the expression effective demand, employed it to denote the demand of those who are willing and able to give for the commodity what he calls its natural price: that is, the price which will enable it to be permanently produced and brought to market.

J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., III. II. § 2.

I would therefore define . . . Demand as the desire for commodities or services, seeking its end by an offer of general purchasing power.

Osborne, Pol. Econ., I. II. § 2.

6. In law: (a) The right to claim anything from another person, whether founded on contract or tort, or superior right of property. (b) The asking or seeking for what is due or claimed as due, either expressly by words, or by implication, as by seizure of goods or entry into lands.—7. Inquiry; question; interrogation.

Then they asked hym many *demand*s, but he wolde speke no more.

Morin (E. E. T. S.), I. 12.

The good Anchoret raised him with his hand.

Who, thus encouraged, answered our demand.

Dryden, Amiel, III.

Alternative demand. See alternativ.—Demand and supply, in polit. econ., the relation between the desire to sell and that to buy, or between those things of exchangeable value which are for sale and those which can be purchased; used most commonly in the expression law of demand and supply, the law that as the demand for a given commodity increases, or while the demand remains the same the supply falls off, the price of that commodity rises; and as the demand falls off, or the supply increases without a corresponding increase of demand, the price falls.

Demand and supply govern the value of all things which cannot be indefinitely increased.

J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., III. III. § 2.

Demand note, a note payable on demand—that is, on presentation; specifically, in the financial history of the United States, one of the notes which composed the issue of $60,000,000 of paper money authorized by a law enacted by Congress in July, 1861, for that purpose.—Effectual demand, in polit. econ. See d.—In demand, in request; much sought after or courted: as, these goods are in demand; his company is in great demand.—On demand, on being claimed; on presentation: as, a bill payable on demand; all checks are payable on demand.

demandaible (dē-mān'ā-b'l), a. [< demand + -able.] That may be demanded, claimed, asked for, or required: as, payment is demandaible at the expiration of the credit.

demandant (dē-mān'dant), n. [< F. demandant (= Sp. Pg. It. demandante), ppr. of demander, demand: see demand.] In law, one who demands; the plaintiff in a real action (so called because he demands something); any plaintiff.

demander (dē-mān'der), n. [< demand + -er. Cf. F. demandeur = Pr. demandaire, demandador = Sp. Pg. demandador = It. demandatore.] One who demands.

Yet, to so fair and courteous a demander,
That promises compassion, at worst pity,
I will relate a little of my story.

Beau. and Fl., Captain, II. 1.

demandress (dē-mān'dres), n. [< demander + -ess.] In law, a female demandant.

demantoid (de-mān'toid), n. [< G. demant, diamant, diamond, + -oid.] A light-green to emerald-green variety of garnet, found in the Ural mountains. It is transparent and of brilliant luster, and is classed as a gem.

demarcate (dē-mār'kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. demarcated, ppr. demarcating. [< NL. demarcatus, pp. of demarcare, mark off, set the bounds of: see demark.] 1. To mark off from adjoining land or territory; set the limits or boundaries of.

The thoughtful critics argue that it was a mistake for us to demarcate the frontier of Afghanistan, for by so doing we have defined and increased our responsibilities.

Nineteenth Century, XXII. 477.

2. To determine the relative limits of; separate or clearly discriminate.

Matter and motion, force and cause, have also their transcendental elements, and it is the province of metaphysics to demarcate these from the known and knowable elements. G. H. Lewis, Prob. of Life and Mind, I. 1. § 43.

demarcation (dē-mār-kā'shən), n. [Also written demarkation; < F. démarcation = Sp. demarcacion = Pg. demarcacão = It. demarcazione, < NL. demarcatio(n-), < demarcare, set the bounds of: see demarcate, demark.] 1. The act of marking off limits or boundaries; determination by survey of the line of separation between adjoining lands or territories; delimitation: as, the demarcation of the frontiers.

The Russian ministers proposed that, before proceeding to actual demarcation, we should settle with them the general principles and cardinal points upon which the joint commission should work. Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 6.

2. In general, the act of determining the relative limits or extent of anything; separation; discrimination.

The speculative line of demarcation, where obedience ought to end and resistance must begin, is faint, obscure, and not easily definable. Burke, Rev. in France.

demarch (dē-mār'ch), n. [< F. démarché, gait, walk, step, a step taken with the object of securing anything, < OF. démarcher, march, walk, advance, < de + marcher, march: see march.] March; excursion; manner of proceeding.

Imagination cultivates reason in its most extravagant demarches. London Journal, 1781.

demarch (dē-mār'ch), n. [< L. demarchus, < Gr. δῆμαρχος, < δήμος, a district, deme, + ἀρχος, ruler.] 1. The ruler or magistrate of an ancient Attic deme.—2. The mayor of a modern Greek town.

demark (dē-mār'k), v. t. [< F. démarquer = Sp. Pg. demarcar = It. demarcare, < NL. demarcare, mark off, set the bounds of, bound, < L. de, off, + ML. marcere, mark, < maro, bound, mark, march: see march.] To mark off; fix the limits or boundaries of; demarcate. demarkation, n. See demarcation.

dematerialization (dē-mā-tē'ri-āl-ī-zā'shən), n. [< dematerialize + -ation.] 1. The act of dematerializing, or divesting of material qualities.

Mrs. Jemima's dowry . . . would suffice to prevent that gradual process of dematerialization which the lengthened diet upon minnows and sticklebacks had already made apparent in the fine and slow-evanishing form of the philosopher.

Bulwer, My Novel, III. 17.

2. In mod. spiritualism, the alleged act or process of dissolving and vanishing after materialization (which see).

Also spelled dematerialisation.
dematerialize (dē-mā-tē'ri-āl-ī-z), v.; pret. and pp. dematerialized, ppr. dematerializing. [= F. dematérialiser; as de-priv. + materialize.] trans. To divest of material qualities or characteristics.

Dematerializing matter by stripping it of everything which . . . has distinguished matter. Nietzsche.

II. intrans. In mod. spiritualism, to dissolve and disappear, as alleged, after materialization.

If he [the ghost] ever "materialized," he was careful to dematerialize again before any one could get a sample of his beautiful work. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 410.

Also spelled dematerialise.
Dematiæ, Dematiæ (dēm-ā-tī'ē-ē, -ī), n. pl. [NL. < Dematium + -æ, -æ, -i.] The largest family of hyphomycetous fungi. The mycelium is usually abundant, fusuous or black, and somewhat rigid. The fertile hyphae and conidia are typically colored like the mycelium, though either, but not both, may be hyaline. Conidia are borne at the top or sides of the fertile hyphae, and are septate in a majority of the species. Many species grow on dead wood and other organic matter; but many also grow on living plants, in some cases causing serious injury to crops. Some are known to be conidial forms of ascomycetous fungi. These fungi are popularly called black molds.

Dematium (de-mat'i-um), n. [NL. < Gr. δῆμα, dim. of δήμα(r-), a bundle, a bend, < δῆμι, tie, bind.] A small genus of Dematiæ, in which the conidia are borne in chains on the sides of the fertile hyphae.

demay (dē-mā'), v. t. [ME. demayen, var. of deemayen, dismay: see dismay.] To be dismayed; fear.

Dere dame, to day demay yow neuer.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 470.

demayne (dē-mān'), n. See demean, demean.

demayne (dē-mān'), n. Same as demean.

deme (dēm), v. An obsolete (Middle English) form of demean. Chaucer.

deme (dēm), n. [< Gr. δῆμος, a district, the people.] 1. A subdivision of ancient Attica and of modern Greece; a township.

The eponymous hero of a deme in Attica. Grote.

Eleusis was the only Attic deme which (perhaps on account of its sacred character) was allowed by Athens to coin money. B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, p. 323.

2. In soil: (a) The tertiary or higher individual resulting from the aggregate integration of merides (see meris); a soid. (b) Any undifferentiated aggregate of plastids or monads. See extract.

The term colony, corm, or deme may indifferently be applied to these aggregates of primary, secondary, tertiary, or quaternary order which are not, however, integrated into a whole. Enay, Bull., XVI. 843.

demean (dē-mēn'), v. t. [< ME. demenen, demeynen, demaynen, demanen, < OF. demener, deminer, demanor, demoner, drive, push, lead, guide, conduct, manage, employ, direct, do, F. démener, reñ, throw one's self about, stir, struggle, = Fr. demener = It. demanare, < ML. as if deminare, conduct, < de, down, away, + minare, lead, L. drive, deponent minari, threaten: see menace, mine.] 1. To lead; guide; conduct.

After that the swimming oil doo gets Into sum thing with fetheres faire and clene,
And in sum goodly vessel it demene.

Palimpsest, Romances (E. E. T. S.), p. 58.

And what ye think that I shall do brawly,
In this matter demene me as ye list.

Gomerides (E. E. T. S.), I. 783.

2. To conduct; manage; control; exercise; do.

Is it not a grete mischaunce,
To let a fool have governance
Of thing that he cannot demene?

Chaucer, House of Fame, I. 369.

How doth the youthful general demene
His actions in these fortunes?

Ford, Broken Heart, I. 2.

Our obdurate clergy have with violence demene'd the matter. Milton, Areopagitica, p. 45.

3. Reflexively, to behave; carry; conduct. And loke ye demene yow so, that noon knowe what we shall ride. Spenser (E. E. T. S.), III. 331.

The king could not be induced to patronize the design, and promised only a conivance in it so long as they demene'd themselves peaceably. Everett, Orations, I. 220.

demean (dē-mēn'), n. [Also archaically de-mayne; < demean, v.; cf. mien.] 1. Dealing; management; treatment.

All the vile demean and usage had

With which he had those two so ill bested.

Spenser, F. Q., VI. vi. 18.

Seeks . . . to winne favour and liking of the people, by gifts and friendly demean towards them.

Hatley's Voyages, I. 434.

2. Mien; demeanor; behavior; conduct.

Then, turning to the Palmer, he can spy
Where at his best, with sorrowfull demean
And deadly best, an armed corse did lie.

Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 23.

You sewers, carvers, ushers of the court,
Strained gentle for your fair demean,
Here I do take of you my last farewell.

Beau. and Fl., Woman-hater, III. 2.

With grave demean and solemn vanity.

West, On Travelling.

demean (dē-mēn'), v. t. [Improp. < de- + mean, base; orig. a misuse of demean.] To debase; lower; lower the dignity or standing of; demean. (This is in origin a misuse of demean by association with the adjective mean. Being thus illegitimate in origin and inconvenient in use, from its tendency to be confused with demean in its proper sense, the word is avoided by scrupulous writers. See demean.)

You base, scurrilous old—but I won't demean myself by naming what you are. Sheridan, The Duenna, I. 2.

It was of course Mrs. Sedley's opinion that her son would demean himself by a marriage with an artist's daughter. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, vi.

demean (dē-mēn'), n. [Var. of demean, demean, q. v.] Same as demean.

demeanant, a. [ME. demenant, < OF. demenant, ppr. of demener, manage, conduct, demean: see demean + -ant.] Carrying on business; trading; dealing.

That no citizen resident withyn the cite and demeanant, haveynge any proteccyon, or beyng outlawed or sourced, bere non office wyth this cite.

English Glode (E. E. T. S.), p. 303.

demeaning (dē-mē-nīng), n. [< ME. demening; verbal n. of demean, v.] Demeanor; behavior.

He was wild in all his demeaning.

Vnto the tyme he drew to more sadnesse;

Thanne afterward he was withoute feynynge

A nobyll knyght. Gomerides (E. E. T. S.), I. 1245.

demeanor, demeanour (dē-mē-nor'), n. [Prop., as in early mod. E., demeanure, < ME. demeanure, < demenen, E. demean, + -ure, E. -our, -or.] 1. Conduct; management; treatment.

God commits the managing so great a trust . . . wholly to the demeanor of every grown man. Milton.

2. Behavior; carriage; bearing; deportment; as, decent demeanor; sad demeanor.

This King Athore was a goodly personage, higher by a foot and a halfe then any of the French, representing a kinde of Malesie and granite in his demeanure.

Purshas, Pilgrimage, p. 771.

The men, as usual, liked her artless kindness and simple, refined demeanor.

Thackeray, Vanity Fair.

A lad who has, to a degree that excites wonder and admiration, the character and demeanor of an intelligent man of mature age, will probably be that, and nothing more, all his life.

Whately, Bacon's Essay, "Youth and Age."

= Way. 2. Conduct, deportment, etc (see behavior), manner, mien, bearing, air.

demeanure, n. See demeanor.

dem-i-brassart (dem-i-bras'grt), n. In plate-armor, the partial covering of the arm, usually worn over the sleeve of the hauberk; especially, that covering the upper arm at the back, as distinguished from the vambrace, which covered the arm below the elbow. Also demigarde-bras.

dem-i-cadence (dem-i-kā'dens), n. In music, a half cadence. It usually denotes the progression from tonic to dominant. See cadence.

dem-i-cannon (dem-i-kan'on), n. A name given to one of the larger kinds of heavy gun, as used in the latter part of the sixteenth century. It is said to have been a piece having a bore of 6½ inches, and throwing a shot weighing 2½ pounds. Some authors describe it as larger than this.

dem-i-caponiere (dem-i-kap-ō-nēr'), n. In fort., a ditch so arranged that a fire can be delivered from one side only. Also half-caponiere.

dem-i-carlino (dem-i-kār-lē'nō), n. A coin equal in value to half a carlino.

dem-i-caster (dem-i-kās'ter), n. 1. An inferior quality of beaver. Hence — 2. A hat made of beaver of this quality.

I know in that more subtil air of yours times sometimes passes for tissue, Venice beads for pearl, and dem-i-casters for beavers. Howell, Letters, iii. 2.

dem-i-chamfron (dem-i-čam'fron), n. A variety of the chamfron that covered the head between the ears and the forehead as far as below the eyes. See chamfron.

dem-i-circule (dem-i-ēr-kl), n. A simple instrument for measuring and indicating angles, sometimes used as a substitute for the theodolite. It consists essentially of a graduated scale of half a circle, a movable rule pivoted on the center so as to sweep the graduated arc, and a compass to show the magnetic bearings. The two objects whose angle is to be measured are sighted along the rule and along the diameter of the scale. E. H. Knight.

dem-i-cuirass (dem-i-kwē'rās), n. The demi-placate or pansiere.

dem-i-culverin (dem-i-kul'ver-in), n. A kind of cannon in use in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It is described as having a bore of 4½ inches and throwing a shot weighing 6½ pounds.

They had planted me three dem-i-culverins just in the mouth of the breach. B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iii. 1.

One [piece of ordnance] . . . was exceeding great, and about sixteen foot long, made of brass, a dem-i-culverin. Coryat, Crudities, i. 125.

dem-i-deify (dem-i-dē'i-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. dem-i-deified, pp. dem-i-deifying. [dem-i- + deify.] To treat as a demigod. [Rare.]

Thus by degrees self-cheated of their sound And sober judgment that he is but man, They dem-i-deify and fume him so That in due season he forgets it too. Cowper, Task, v. 260.

dem-i-distance (dem-i-dis'tans), n. In fort., the distance between the outward polygons and the flank.

dem-i-ditone (dem-i-dī'tōn), n. In music, a minor third.

dem-i-gauntlet (dem-i-gānt'let), n. In surv., a bandage, resembling a glove, used in setting disjointed fingers.

dem-i-god (dem-i-god), n. [Formerly as dem-y-god; < demi- + god; cf. F. demi-dieu.] An inferior or minor deity; one partaking of the divine nature; specifically, a fabulous hero produced by the intercourse of a deity with a mortal.

He took his leave of them whose eyes had him farwell with tears, making temples to him as to a dem-i-god. Shr. F. Sidney.

We . . . find ourselves to have been deceived, they declaring themselves in the end to be frail men, whom we judged dem-i-gods. Hooker, Discourse, Polity, vii. 24.

To be gods, or angels, dem-i-gods. Milton, P. L., ix. 387.

View him [Voltaire] at Paris in his last career, Surrounding through the dem-i-god reverend. Cowper, Truth, i. 512.

dem-i-goddess (dem-i-god'es), n. A female deity of the minor or inferior order.

dem-i-gorge (dem-i-gōrj), n. In fort., that part of the polygon which remains after the flank is raised, and goes from the curtain to the angle of the polygon. It is half of the vacant space of or entrance into a bastion.

dem-i-grate (dem-i-grāt), v. t. [< L. demigratus, pp. of demigrare, migrate from, < de, from, + migrare, migrate; see migrate.] To emigrate; expatriate one's self. Cockeram.

dem-i-gration (dem-i-grā'shon), n. [< L. demigratio], < demigrare, migrate from; see demigrate.] Emigration; banishment.

We will needs bring upon ourselves the curse of Cain, to put ourselves from the side of Eden into the land of Nod, that is, of dem-i-gration. Sp. Hall, Quo Vadis? § 12.

dem-i-grevilère (dem-i-gre-vi-lēr'), n. Same as demi-jambe.

dem-i-hag, n. [Also demi-hake, demi-hague, < demi- + hag, "hake," hague, short for hagbut, hackbut.] A kind of firearm, a smaller kind of hackbut, in use in the second half of the sixteenth century. See hackbut.

The short gun, the hagbut, and the demi-hake were derivatives, in the natural order of evolution, from the bombards of Crecey and the more perfect pieces of artillery that had enabled Henry VII. to establish his supremacy over the remnant of the nobles left by the wars of the Roses. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 222.

dem-i-island (dem-i-i'land), n. A peninsula.

The place from which the Turks were to have had the aforesaid booty was almost in manner an island . . . Thus was the Persian armie quite discomfited in this dem-i-island. Knox, Hist. Turke.

dem-i-jambe, n. A piece of armor covering the front of the leg only. Compare bainberg. Also called demi-grevière.

dem-i-john (dem-i-jon), n. [An acronym. (as if demi- + John) of F. damejeanne, a demijohn, an acronym. (as if Dame Jeanne, Lady Jane) of Ar. damagan, a demijohn, said to be so called from Damagan, a town in northern Persia, once famous for its glass-works. The forced resemblance to John is in accordance with the humorous colloquial use of proper names as names for vessels; examples are Jack, Jill, and (prob.) Jug; see these words.] A large glass vessel or bottle with a bulging body and small neck, usually cased in wickerwork, but sometimes in a wooden box with a notch in the top extending over the neck of the vessel, for convenience in pouring out its contents.

dem-i-lance (dem-i-lāns), n. 1. A short and light spear introduced in the sixteenth century.

Light dem-i-lances from afar they throw, Fasten'd with leathern thongs to gull the foe. Dryden, Æneid.

2. A lightly armed horseman, especially one armed with a demi-lance. The demi-lances seem to have succeeded the hobbiers of the middle age, and to have been the prototypes of the more modern light horse.

Pedro, did you send for this tailor? or you, Moncodo? This light French dem-i-lance that follows us? Flotaker and Rowley, Maid in the Mill, III. 2.

To equip, in especial, as many dem-i-lances, or light horsemen, as they could, and to meet the Duke at Walden. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

3. The armor worn by such a horseman, consisting of open helmet, breast- and back-pieces, usually fitted with pauldrons, tassets, and, rarely, brassards or demi-brassards.

Also formerly demi-lance.

dem-i-lune (dem-i-lūn), n. and a. [F., < demi, half, + lune, moon; see lune.] 1. A crescent.

It is an immense mass of stone of the shape of a dem-i-lune with a bar in the middle of the concave. Roger North, Lord Guilford, I. 228.

In some cases we find also in which these small cells are not arranged in dem-i-lunes. Engg. Bril., XVII. 672.

2. In fort., an outwork consisting of two faces and two little flanks, constructed to cover the curtain and shoulders of the bastion.

He laid his hand, as Drayton might have said, on that stout bastion, horn-work, ravelin, or dem-i-lune which formed the outworks to the citadel of his purple tale of man. Kingsley, Westward Ho, viii.

Dem-i-lunes of Haldenham. Same as crescents of Gien (which see, under crescent).

II. a. Crescent-shaped.

The dem-i-lunes cells and the serous cells which are present in considerable number in the sub-maxillary gland of the cat. Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXVIII. 215.

dem-i-mentonnière (dem-i-men-to-ni-ēr'), n. In armor, a mentonnière for the tilt, protecting the left side strongly, high and heavy, and secured firmly to the breastplate, but leaving the right side unprotected. Compare just.

dem-i-metamorphosis (dem-i-met-ə-mōr'fō-sis), n. Incomplete or imperfect metamorphosis, as of an insect; hemimetabolism.

dem-i-metope (dem-i-met-ō-pē), n. In arch., a half metope, sometimes found at the angles of a Doric frieze in Roman, Renaissance, or other debased examples.

dem-i-monde (dem-i-mond), n. [F., < demi, half, + monde, the world, society, < L. mundus, the world; see mundane.] 1. A term introduced by Alexandre Dumas the younger to denote (as defined by himself) that class of women who occupy an equivocal position between women of good reputation and social standing on the one hand and courtesans on the other; women of equivocal reputation and standing in society. — 2. Commonly, but less correctly, courtesans in general.

A maker or creator; the Creator of the world; specifically, a supernatural being imagined by some as the creator of the world in subordination to the Supreme Being. In the Gnostic system the Demiurge (also called Archon, and Jaldabaoth, or son of Chaos) was represented as the chief of the lowest order of spirits or sons of the Hieronymus. Mingling with Chaos, he evolved from it a corporeal, animated world. He could not, however, impart to man the true soul or pneuma, but only a sensuous one, psyche. He was identified with the Jehovah of the Jews, and was by some regarded as the originator of evil.

God defined as First Cause . . . would not be God, but a demiurge, or subordinately creative deity, created to create the world. Hodgeon, Phil. of Religion, III. xl. § 6.

It is much easier to believe that in some way unknown to our finite intelligence the power and goodness of God are compatible with the existence of evil than that the world is the work of an inferior demiurge or other demon.

Edinburgh Rev.

The Gnostics agreed in attributing the world in which we live to an Angel, or a Demiurge, inferior to the Infinite God. G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 285.

2. In some Peloponnesian states of ancient Greece, one of a class of public officers who in some cases appear to have constituted the chief executive magistracy.

demiurgeous (dem'i-erj-us), a. [< demiurge + -ous.] Of the nature of or resembling a demiurge; of demiurgic character. [Rare.]

There is, in our drunken land, a certain privilege extended to drunkenness. . . . Our demiurgeous Mrs. Grundy smiles apologetically on its victims.

R. L. Stevenson, Familiar Studies of Men and Books, Pref.

demiurgic, demiurgical (dem'i-erj'ik, -ji-kl), a. [< L. as if demiurgicus, < Gr. δημιουργικός, < δημιουργός, demiurge; see demiurge.] Pertaining to a demiurge, or to the act or process of creation.

Far beyond all other political powers of Christianity is the demiurgic power of this religion over the kingdoms of human opinion.

De Quincey.

To play the part of a demiurge was a delight to Shelley; even to have an interest in the demiurgic effort was no mean happiness.

E. Dowson, Shelley, II. 304.

demi-vambrace (dem'i-vam'brās), n. In armor, a plate of iron protecting the outside of the forearm, and adjusted over a sleeve of mail or a sleeve of gambouled work.

Government by the people; a system of government in which the sovereign power of the state is vested in the people as a whole, and is exercised directly by them or their elected agents.

The majority, having the whole power of the community, may employ all that power in making laws, and executing those laws; and there the form of the government is a perfect democracy.

Locke.

In this open democracy [of the town meeting], every opinion had utterance; every objection, every fact, every acre of land, every bushel of rye, its entire weight.

Emerson, Hist. Discourse at Concord.

2. A state or civil body in which the people themselves exercise all legislative authority, and confer all executive and judicial powers, either by direct collective action or through elected representatives. Athens and some of the other ancient Greek states, and within the limits of their power, the canton of Appenzel in Switzerland and the towns of the northern United States, are instances of democracies of the first class. In democratic republics generally, however, all power is exercised by delegated authority. See republic.

3. Political and social equality in general; a state of society in which no hereditary differences of rank or privilege are recognized: opposed to aristocracy.

Rank nor name nor pomp has he
In the grave's democracy.

Whittier, Grave by the Lake.

4. [esp.] In U. S. polit. hist.: (a) The system of principles held by the Democratic party. See democratic. (b) The members of the Democratic party collectively.

[The Missouri controversy] was a political movement for the balance of power, balked by the Northern Democracy, who saw their own overthrow, and the eventual separation of the States, in the establishment of geographical parties divided by a slavery and anti-slavery line.

T. H. Benton, Thirty Years, I. 10.

5. In a collective sense, the people; especially, the people regarded as exercising political powers.

Thence to the famous orators repair,
Those ancient, whose restless eloquence Wielded at will that fierce democracy.

Milton, P. R., iv. 299.

Social democracy. See social.

democrat (dem'ō-krat), n. [= D. demokrāt = G. Dan. Sw. demokrāt, < F. démocrate = Sp. democrata = Pg. democrata, < *NL. *democrata*, < Gr. δημοκρατία, base of δημοκρατία, < δημος, the people, + κρατειν, rule, be strong, < κράτος, strength, < κράτος, strong, = Goth. hardus = E. hard, q. v.] 1. One who believes in or adheres to democracy as a principle of government or of organized society; one who believes in political and natural equality; an opponent of arbitrary or hereditary distinctions of rank and privilege: opposed to aristocrat.

Like most women of first-rate ability, she was at bottom a democrat; rank was her convenience, but she had no respect for it or belief in it.

J. Hawthorne, Dust, p. 127.

2. [esp.] A member of the Democratic party in the United States.

The name Democrat, now in use by one of the great parties North and South, was originally a term of reproach, like that of Jacobin, and subsequently like that of Locofoco, and has been freely accepted at the South only since the Rebellion.

Quoted by Thurston Wood, Antislavery, p. 126.

8. A light wagon without a top, containing several seats, and usually drawn by two horses. Originally called democratic wagon. [Western and Middle U. S.]—social democrat. See social. democratic (dē-mō-kra-tī'k), a. [= F. démocratique = Sp. Pg. democrático (cf. D. democrático) = G. demokratisch = Dan. Sw. demokratisk] < NL. **democratia*, < Gr. δημοκρατία, < δημος, democracy; see democrat.] 1. Pertaining to or characteristic of democracy as a principle of government.

The democratic theory is that those constitutions are likely to prove steadiest which have the broadest base, that the right to vote makes a safety-valve of every voter, and that the best way of teaching a man how to vote is to give him the chance of practice. Lowell, Democracy.

2. [esp. or l. c.] In U. S. politics, of pertaining to, or characteristic of the Democratic party; being a supporter of the Democratic party; as, a Democratic newspaper; the Democratic platform; a Democratic convention.

He was democratic, not in the modern sense of the term, as never holding a caucus nomination, and never thinking differently from the actual administration; but on principle, as founded in a strict, in contradistinction to a latitudinarian, construction of the constitution. T. H. Benton, Thirty Years, II. 128.

8. Pertaining to or characteristic of democracy as a social principle; maintaining or manifesting equal natural rights and privileges; hence, free from forced inequality or servility; being on a common level: opposed to aristocratic; as, a democratic community or assemblage; democratic manners.—Democratic party, a political party of the United States, whose distinctive principles are strict construction of the constitution with respect to the powers delegated to the general government and those reserved to the States, and the least possible interference of government with individual and local liberty of action. Hence it has opposed national centralization, supported liberal extensions of the electoral franchise, advocated low tariff duties with a view to revenue rather than protection, and contended for close limitation of the objects of public expenditure. It was at first known as the Anti-Federal party, then took the name of Republican, and finally (about 1790) that of Democratic-Republican, which is still its formal designation; but it was many years before Democratic was generally accepted as its shortened name instead of Republican, the change beginning about 1810. See Republicans.

democratically (dē-mō-kra-tī'k-ly), a. and adv. 1. a. Characterized by democracy; of a democratic nature or tendency; democratic.

Although their condition and fortunes may place them many spheres above the multitude, yet are they still within the line of vulgaritry, and the Democrat is an enemy of truth. Sir T. Browne, Pseud. Epist. (1646), I. iv. 12.

Every expansion of the scheme of government they [the framers of the American Constitution] elaborated has been in a democratical direction. Lowell, Democracy.

In fire, air, flood, or under ground,
Whose power hath a true consent
With planet, or with element.

Milton, II. Penseroso, l. 23.

Soon was a world of holy Demons made,
Aerial spirits, by great Jove design'd
To be on earth the guardians of mankind.

T. (note, tr. of Hesiod's Works and Days, l.

A demon, in the philosophy of Plato, though inferior to a deity, was not an evil spirit, and it is extremely doubtful whether the existence of evil demons was known to either of the Greeks or Romans till about the time of the advent of Christ.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, l. 404.

2. An evil spirit; a devil: from the belief of the early Christian world that all the divinities of the pagans were devils.

If that same demon, that hath gull'd thee thus,
Should with his lion gait walk the whole world,
He might return to vasty Tartar back,
And tell the legions, I can never win
A soul so easy as that Englishman's.

Shak., Hen. V., II. 2.
